He could not consent to go further than he had stated, much less admit that by their own single act they had become a separate sovereignty, for, if such a principle was sanctioned, it was impossible to foresee all the consequences and extent of them. If they were, as had been represented, at this moment an independent State, they might offer or refuse at pleasure to become a party to this confederacy, or they might, in offering to enter into the Union, annex to the offer such terms and conditions as should give them advantages over the other States, and they might even treat and ally themselves with any foreign power. Although such a hostile or menacing measure was not to be apprehended on the part of a people so regardful of their true interests as those in question were, yet what security could there be for the prevalence of an equally good disposition through the whole extent of the other territory in which ten new States had been contemplated, and in a part of which resided many whose attachment to another government was well known? The rule they were now about to establish must operate in future as a guide, and it needed no effort to believe that this country would on some future occasion, and that perhaps not distant, lament the adoption of the principles contained in the report.

Where can you find a more emphatic protest against the policy of allowing Territories to set up for themselves? The vote in both Houses was very close and the measure passed only after a conference on the disagreeing votes; showing a wide difference of opinion in regard to its wisdom and propriety. Next comes the case of Michigan. Now, Mr. President, surely this Senate will not look to Michigan as a safe precedent for our guidance in the admission of a new State. Why, sir, the conduct of the people of the Territory of Michigan, under the lead of a very young and ambitious man, Stevens T. Mason, who by accident became Territorial governor, came nearer involving this country in civil war and bloodshed than any event in its history up to that time; in fact nearer than any up to 1861. They undertook to set up a State government, with boundary lines embracing parts of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, after these States had been admitted to the Union under enabling acts by Congress fixing their boundaries.

Does not the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], who lays great stress on this Michigan precedent, remember—of course he does—that an armed conflict was imminent between the people of his own State and those of the people of the Michigan Territory, and was prevented by the intervention of the United States Government, and that the action of Michigan was denounced at the time in and out of Congress as "revolutionary?" Does he not recall that Congress denied to Michigan the right of petition as a State, and would not permit her petition to be referred, because she petitioned as a State, and until it was amended? Surely he does. If that precedent is to be followed the State of Dakota would not be before this Senate now in that attitude. The Supreme Court of the United States in effect declared in the case of "Scott vs. The Detroit Young Men's Society" that the organization of the State by the people of Michigan Territory was "a crime," and of course a nullity in law, and by many of the most conservative, ablest statesmen of that day it was characterized as "revolutionary."

If we had been as vigilant as our fathers, Dakota's petition would have been modified before reference to the committee. Like Michigan, she came here as a State, having usurped power to become a State, presenting the anomaly of two organized governments, State and Territorial, exercising the functions of governing at the same time within the same territory. Where can a warrant for it be found in the Constitution and laws of this country? Let us then discard this precedent as one unfit to be followed.

And so with Arkansas—the circumstances of her admission are too well known to require extended notice. At that time the two political Titans, Slavery and Anti-slavery, were approaching each other on converging lines—Arkansas represented one and Michigan the other—and both were taken into the Union in an irregular and as I insist unconstitutional manner as acts of propitiation, of compromise, to temporize with the impending "irrepressible conflict." These two giants were each struggling for power, and many desperate expedients were resorted to for aggrandizement. It would have been better for the country, better for posterity, if the issue had been joined then and settled than to have postponed it thirty years, when the power and capacity of the sections to destroy each other had so largely increased.

The same observations apply with equal force to Iowa and Florida, but they had enabling acts; and Missouri, Wisconsin, and Nevada, cited in the report, are not correctly cited. They had enabling acts and under them organized their State governments. California and Oregon are also exceptional. The two former were remote, outlying Territories, difficult of access to and from the seat of government at Washington, requiring weeks and months for communication, now accomplished in hours and days. The former, then lately acquired by conquest under the dominion of a military authority, a form of government repugnant to the American system, Congress might have been excused, if not justified, in making an exception in her favor under all the circumstances, and so of Oregon and for many of the same reasons. Oregon was up to 1846 under the joint occupancy of Great Britain and the United States, and, as I have stated, she was a remote, outlying Territory. It therefore became important to the people of that section of country that they should have larger powers than they could have under the protection of a Territorial government, which has its existence only by virtue of the power of Congress over the Territories.

Is there anything in the present condition of our affairs to justify this confessedly extraordinary proceeding on the part of the people of so-called South Dakota to set up for themselves a State government without the consent of Congress, in defiance of the action of Congress on her former application? Slavery is dead, and has ceased to be an irritating factor in our politics. The "irrepressible conflict" is ended, and the sections are becoming more and more homogeneous in thought and purpose. Time is smoothing down the asperities born of civil conflict. We are happily at peace. The Territories are being settled up by an intelligent race of pioneers from all parts of the country, and, in the main, well governed. Why then depart from the time-honored, safe, constitutional rule for their admission into the family of States? I confess, sir, I can not realize the necessity. Of the twenty-five States admitted into the Union but five have come in this irregular manner—one-fifth.

Is there a pressing political exigency lurking behind this movement which impels it forward with almost unseemly haste and zeal? Is there a purpose underlying the pressure for Statehood to forestall the orderly progress of events in Dakota Territory under a new national administration, which might change the political complexion of representatives sent to the National Legislature different from those now seeking admission from this so-called State? I can not divest my mind of such a suspicion, and that a "snap" judgment would be rendered if we ratify this effort to make a State.

Now, sir, assuming for the sake of the argument there is ample authority for the bill of the committee in the practices and precedents of the Government, let us briefly examine the proceedings out of which this so-called State is said to have grown. It appears the Legislature of Dakota, on the 9th of March, 1885, passed "An act providing for a constitutional convention and the formation of a State constitution preparatory to the admission of Dakota into the Union, and for other purposes," and appropriated $20,000 to carry out its provisions. I would like to inquire of some champion of this bill where the Territorial Legislature derived its power to pass such an act. From Congress? I have seen no evidence of it. It was then clearly ultra vires and void. Were the delegates and councilmen elected to this Legislature on the question of such legislation? In other words, did the qualified voters of that Territory have that issue presented to them when they cast their votes and have a fair opportunity of expressing their wishes in regard to the matter of Statehood and a division of their Territory? These are pregnant questions, and must be answered before we can pass intelligently on this bill. And it becomes equally important to have explained how it is that in a new country out of a population of 263,000 in South Dakota only 31,791 votes were cast at the election had on the adoption or rejection of the constitution in November, 1885—25,226 for and 6,565 against.

With a ratio of 1 to 5, which I believe is the usual ratio, this vote would represent only about 150,000 inhabitants; but with a ratio of 1 to 4, which is more accurate for a new country where the number of adults and voters exceed those in older settled communities, this vote would represent only about 125,000 of population, leaving 128,000 unrepresented; a majority of the population, and of course of the voters. Were these 128,000 opposed to this so-called constitution? Did they have an opportunity of expressing their opinions? These are equally pregnant questions and ought to be answered, to say nothing of the 150,000 of population north of the forty-sixth parallel, who have not been consulted at all.

I have received intimations of fraud and corrupt bargains and political intrigues affecting the integrity of these proceedings which, if true, and I have no doubt they are true, would vitiate them. And I may say in passing, the great difficulty I have had in considering former memorials of these people for authority to make a State has been the taint of ringism, crimination and recrimination, accusations and counter-accusations, and repudiation that have always accompanied them. It has been unfortunate for the good people of that Territory, and they are still the victims of such misfortunes. Why not, then, pass the bill I have introduced as a substitute for the committee bill, enabling the people of the entire Territory to vote on the question of their admission into the Union and settle the question of division afterward?

The present line on the forty-sixth parallel is not acceptable to many, possibly to a majority. The seventh standard line has been suggested, and the Missouri River as more practicable lines of division. And then a large number of the people are represented to me as being opposed to any division. So, I repeat, why not afford the people a chance in a regular, constitutional, orderly way to pass upon all these questions, as is proposed in the substitute, and when we meet here again at the next session have the material for intelligent action. If the bill requires amendment in any essential particular, let us amend it. If it is acceptable as it is, let us pass it.

I desire to correct an impression, if such exists, which may have been created by some remarks which have fallen from the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] that I entertain an unfriendly feeling toward Dakota. If such impression prevails it is a great mistake and does me injustice. There is nothing within the range of my constitutional power and duty that I would not do to promote their welfare and happiness, and I beg to assure them that, with my sense of official duty, if the Territory were as largely Democratic as it appears now to be Republican in politics I should feel constrained to oppose this method of becoming a State and remand the question to the people, as I am now proposing. The worst enemies the people of that grand domain have ever had are certain self-seeking politicians, who employ vulgar abuse through the columns of disreputable newspapers to traduce all who challenge their methods and decline to become a party to their corrupt practices, and the most fortunate consummation that could befall the country would be their retirement.

It has been my good fortune to serve on this floor with one of the gentlemen [Mr. Edgerton] now applying for a seat in this Chamber as a Senator from the so-called State of Dakota, and it gives me pleasure to bear willing testimony in this public manner to his high character. In his present attitude I regret I can not extend to him the assistance of my vote, as there is no man outside of my party friends I would more cordially welcome into this high forum. The other gentleman I do not know personally, but have been pleased to hear from his friends high encomiums upon his character.

Now, Mr. President, a word of a somewhat personal nature. On the 16th of December last I had the honor to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committees on Territories be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire and report to the Senate under and by what authority a so-called State Legislature has been organized in the Territory of Dakota, if such a body has been organized as alleged, and by what warrant or authority said organization has proceeded to elect Senators to this body. And that said committee inquire further and report whether said organization is not calculated to bring about a conflict of authority prejudicial to the good order of said Territory, and demoralizing to the Territorial government legally organized and administered under the authority of the National Government, and that said committee have leave to report any special matter relating to the affairs of said Territory requiring or demanding the attention of Congress.

And on the 18th the following was introduced by my friend, the honorable senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]:

Resolved, That the memorial from certain persons calling themselves "the State executive committee of the State of Dakota," and referred to the Committee on Territories, shall be considered in no other light than as a memorial coming from individual citizens of the Territory of Dakota.

In due course they were referred to the Committee on Territories, and the Senate soon after adjourned for the Christmas holidays. At the very first meeting of the committee after the holidays both resolutions were reported adversely.

No proper opportunity was given, certainly to me, to be heard in regard to them—no notice of an intention on the part of the committee to consider them was vouchsafed.

Mr. President, the resolutions are perfectly respectful; they relate to very important questions and inquiries, as it occurred to the movers, and yet they were railroaded through the committee—if I may be allowed to use such an expression—without deliberation. I can not conceive that any personal discourtesy was intended to the movers of the resolutions, and yet it appears to me the haste with which they were acted on was almost unseemly. Why such haste? Was it because it was feared the weakness of the so-called State might have been exposed by satisfactory evidence on a full hearing, or that the motives behind the zeal of the "State executive committee" were controlled by an inordinate anxiety for party aggrandizement or party advantage, and that the blessing asked for Dakota was intended for the "executive committee?" Who before ever heard of a State, or the people of a Territory, asking Congress for Statehood through an "executive committee" of a political party—for that is what this executive committee is? No such organization is known to the law of this land that is capable of any legislative act.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not mean to say that, I am sure.

Mr. BUTLER. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. Then the Senator has not read the constitution. If he had, he would have found just how this committee was constituted and what its duties were. It is not the executive committee of a political party.

Mr. BUTLER. Not so upon the face of it.

Mr. HARRISON. Not so in any sense.

Mr. BUTLER. Not so upon the face of it. It purports to be the executive committee of the convention of the State of Dakota; and in my examination of the precedents for the admission of States into this Union it is the first time I have ever found an executive committee representing the State or the people of a Territory.

When conventions desire to communicate with Congress touching so important a matter as this, it usually has done so through its chosen officers or by duly elected delegates. But it is left to a small band of anxious patriots in Dakota to invent a new order of things and come here through an "executive committee."

If this Senate had been as scrupulous in this regard as it was when the Michigan case was received, the resolution of the Senator from Missouri would have been adopted and these memorialists required to abate somewhat their pretentions before they would have been heard.

I know, Mr. President, it will be contended that what I insist upon is matter of form and not of substance; that the constitution presented voices the wishes of the people of Dakota, is republican in form, not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and therefore ought to be ratified. But, sir, I take issue with this proposition. If it be true we might as well tear away and disregard all the forms and ceremonies and technicalities prescribed by law and custom and practice for the conduct of human government and human affairs, and go to the essence and merits of all questions confronting us and accept as law whatever is done and acquiesced in—may as well abolish parliamentary rules of procedure in deliberative bodies and pleadings in judicial forums as to say we will accept Dakota as she is here presented, because it is the right thing to do, the people want it, although the method is irregular; it is substantially right, although technically and constitutionally wrong, and the irregularity will be condoned by acquiescence and consent.

This, Mr. President, is a dangerous doctrine for legislative guidance, and I warn the Senate, if adopted, it may lead to complications and troubles in the future that may involve us in serious difficulties. The best way is the straight way, and the straight way is the constitutional way, and the constitutional way is the way I have indicated in the substitute I have offered—a simple enabling act, about which there can be no dispute or cavil.

When the people of Dakota come I want them to be instructed with the correct countersign, and if it should be my fortune then to be on guard, I will, as far as my humble efforts can do so, pass her into the very heart of the citadel of the American Union.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States is not meaningless wherein it declares that—

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

But one limitation is put upon the right of the people to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances, and the limitation in no sense interferes with the right, but rather is an aid to its perfect enjoyment. The great right to assemble must be peaceably exercised. Under such form of government as ours the right to assemble can not wisely be exercised except through peaceable lines of action. The people of Dakota have exercised this right, and they have observed the constitutional limitation. They patiently waited for Congress to act and invite them to assemble. This invitation might have been extended by the passage of an enabling act, under and in pursuance of which the people of Dakota could have framed their petition for admission into the Union as a State. The act was not passed. The right of the people to assemble was not thereby avoided; and although the Constitution says that Congress shall make no law abridging this right, the necessities of a frontier people and their movements for relief, heretofore recognized and approved in numerous instances by the Government, affirm that Congress shall not by inaction detract from the right to assemble nor deny the right of petition. The office of the Constitution in this regard was not to create but to preserve and enforce the right involved. The right antedated the Constitution and was and is necessary to the stability of the Government which that instrument ordained and established. The peaceable exercise of this right is not revolutionary. The exercise of the right by the people of Dakota was peaceable. They selected their own mode for its exercise, but kept their every movement within the only limitation imposed by the Constitution. The Constitution does not prescribe any forms or rules for the government of the people when they assemble. Nor does it define a form to be followed in the preparation of the petition which a peaceable assembly of the people may present to the Government for a redress of grievances. The people of a territory might peaceably assemble and agree to petition Congress for the passage of an act enabling them to prepare a form of State government preparatory to admission into the Union; and they might peaceably assemble without an enabling act and prepare a form of State government and petition Congress to accept it by an act of admission into the Union on unequal footing with the other States. This latter method has been adopted by the peopl e of Dakota, and their petition in the form indicated has been received by this Senate and sent to the appropriate committee for consideration and report. Is this revolutionary? If so, then were the movements which organized the States of Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa, California, Oregon, and others, and brought them into the Union, revolutionary. They were not revolutionary, nor is the movement of the people of Dakota.

Mr. President, Senators who insist that every step from Territorial conditions to recognized Statehood must be prescribed by law of Congress have very imperfect knowledge of the processes which have created new States. Some of the most loyal and patriotic States in this Union laid their foundations in violation of Congressional enactments. I do not mean merely the foundations of the technical State, but of the substructures upon which the feet of civilized men were planted in their first efforts to displace savagery with civilization in the regions out of which States long since members of the Union were subsequently carved. The pioneers who pushed our frontiers westward did their work in spite of Congressional enactment. From 1807 to 1841 the law relative to the disposal of the public lands tended to repress the movements of our people toward the West. The act of 1807 denounced every man a trespasser who entered upon the public lands prior to purchase in pursuance of the system of sale then in force, and so continued until 1841, when the pre-emption law was enacted. Every such trespasser was liable to removal, fine, and imprisonment. But in spite of that law our frontier line was carried westward. The pioneer built his cabin, improved the land, created conditions which enforced the organization of Territorial governments and evolved States. The men who did these things were not of revolutionary tendencies. They were not enemies of public order, nor did they array themselves against the general welfare. They made their "claims" on public lands from which the letter of the law excluded them. They entered upon the territory now embraced within the boundaries of the State of Iowa in 1830, and were denounced as lawless men by John C. Calhoun. He made a speech in the Senate on January 27, 1838, in which he said:

If I am correctly informed, the Iowa country has already been seized on by a lawless body of armed men, who have parceled out the whole region and have entered into written stipulations to stand by and protect each other, and who are actually exercising the right of ownership and sovereignty over it, permitting none to settle without their leave, and exacting more for the license to settle than the Government does for the land itself.

Here is evidence of the very imperfect conception of John C. Calhoun of the true character of the brave, hardy, resolute citizens whom he denounced as a "lawless body of armed men." He did not understand their methods nor comprehend their work. He and those of his agreeing associates in Congress, by opposing a liberalization of our land laws, by insisting upon the harsh and repressive statute of 1807, evolved the very conditions which compelled the early settlers of Iowa and other Western Territories to institute those protective regulations and associations by means of which they stood by and protected each other, and which he denounced as lawless. In no right sense were those settlers or their methods lawless. They were conservative in their movements and wise in their selection of means. They were seeking homes, and, in orderly ways, they established them; and every home they established was a stone laid in the foundation of the future State. They had a keener perception of the necessities of the case with which they were definitely dealing than Congress possessed. The so-called lawless methods which excited the opposition and induced the ire of Calhoun took form in the "claims associations," which stood as guardians around and about the homes of the members, and saved them from the greed and rapacity of those who had remained in the older settlements and States until the contact of the pioneers with the wilderness and savagery made the new regions, subdued by them, safe places for the investment of money in lands. These "claim associations" were not instrumentalities of lawlessness. They were as formal and orderly as established government. They embraced the elements of legislative, executive, and judicial power. They were the result of conditions with which the repressive features of the act of 1807 could not be harmonized. Recognizing these facts, Mr. Webster, in a speech delivered in the Senate two days after Mr. Calhoun had made the one from which I have quoted, said:

Now the practical question is, what is to be done with these cases? What are we to do with those settlers, their improvements, and the lands on which they live? Is there any one who would propose or desire that these lands should be put up at public auction, improvements and all, and sold to the highest bidder, without any regard to the interests or protection of the settlers? For my part, I could propose no such thing, nor by any means consent to any such thing.

But, Mr. President, the land laws in force at the time Mr. Webster made this utterance required the doing of the very thing which he said could not receive his consent. The "claims associations" were the informal courts of equity which protected the settlers from the appropriation by others, under the forms of law, of the results of their hardy and patriotic adventures. But neither the settlers nor their methods of protection were in any proper sense lawless, and against the charge that they were Mr. Webster opposed a just and vigorous defense. He said:

Much has been said of the general character of these settlers. I have no extensive information, sir, on that point, and had not intended to say anything upon it. But it has so happened that I have recently been in the Northwest, and I have met, for a short time, with many of these settlers, and, since they have been spoken of here with so much harshness, I feel bound to say that, so far as my knowledge of them goes, they do not deserve it. Undoubtedly, sir, they are trespassers in the contemplation of law. They know that very well. They are on the public lands without title; but then they say that the course of the Government heretofore has been such as to induce and encourage them to go where they are, and that they are ready and willing to do all that the Government has required from others in similar circumstances, that is, to pay for the lands at the common price. They have the general character of frontiersmen; they are hardy, adventurous, and enterprising. They have come from far to establish themselves and families in new abodes in the West. They appeared to me to be industrious and laborious, and I saw nothing in their character or conduct that should justly draw upon them the expressions of contumely and reproach.

The settlers here described were of those who carried civilization from the East to the West, and planted States as mile-stones along its line of progress. Look at the mighty work that they have done. Who can calculate the value of the results which have come to this country from their resolute contests with the wilds of the West and the hardships of pioneer life? In their efforts to secure homes beyond the lines of established and effective government they created conditions which existing law did not compass. Hence the rules they established and the associations they formed, not to the hurt of others, but to the help of all and to the promotion of the general welfare. It took the Government a long time to understand the movements of these men and to realize how sorely they needed an adaptation of the land laws to the circumstances which attended them. But time and continued agitation brought a partial remedy through the enactment of the general pre-emption law. Then, within the limits of the surveyed lands, the settlers could secure their homes without resort to those expedients which the necessities of their case had given the force of definite law to their isolated communities. And nowhere can be found greater respect for personal and property rights than in those regions where the scattered and simple homes of the early settlers foretold the coming State. Consult the history of those movements of population which resulted in the settlement, development, and admission into the Union of that magnificent group of States from and including Ohio and Michigan on the east to California and Oregon on the west, and test my statement by their start and the stages of their progress. You will find it all measured in duration by the terms of life of men yet living. It is a wondrous history, and when you examine the instructive details of its earlier periods, as they apply to each successive State, you find an almost unbroken story of order and respect for personal and property rights. No spirit of revolution attended the orderly march of the people concerning whom that history gives you information save that which subdued barbaric conditions and established in their stead the presence of civilization and the reign of law.

Mr. President, need I remind the members of this Senate how forcefully the settlers of unexplored regions, the administrators of territorial affairs, the creators of States, who laid the lines of that wondrous history, impressed themselves, their characteristics, their necessities, their ideas of government and progress on the laws and institutions of this Republic? Do we not all understand how resolutely they pressed upon Congress their demand for an adjustment of the law relative to the public domain to the conditions which attended their personal and primitive movements? Do we forget how the repressive statute of 1807 gave way, now and then, to temporary expedients, then to the pre-emption law of 1841, and finally the homestead system of 1862, which, if there were nothing else than it in the record of acts done by the Republican party would justify its presence as a political organization and force in the affairs of this country? We do not forget these things, nor can we overlook the fact that the germs from which these successive growths of better laws came were embedded in the "claims associations" of the pioneers who subdued the Western wilds and transformed them into the States which from time to time were admitted to their present positions in the Union.

Mr. President, this brings me to another field of exceptional action by Congress relative to the populations who moved our frontier settlements toward the West, secured governmental recognition, and administered the affairs of organized Territories. The general rule was that they would not be allowed to move in the matter of the organization of a State government except by authority and in pursuance of an enabling act passed by Congress. The people of the Territories observed this general rule when it was put into action by Congress with justice and reasonable dispatch. When Congress failed of its duty in this regard the people of neglected Territories put their own desires into orderly action, framed and adopted constitutions of State government, disturbed the neglectful repose of the legislative power of the nation by knocking at its door and demanding admission into the Union. Do we forget how in those instances Congress bestirred itself, swung open the doors, and invited the importunate Territories to put on the garb of Statehood, and take their places in the Union? If we forget, a turning of the pages of our legislative history will show us that this was often and invariably done. Through these doors Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa, Oregon, and other States entered the Union. No enabling acts of Congress observed by them preceded their organizations of the forms of State government. They came to Congress not asking permission to act in the matter of transforming themselves from Territories to States, but, having acted in that regard, they demanded recognition. It was always given. Congress did not say that these proceedings were revolutionary. The people who had moved in them and organized them were not denounced as lawless and revolutionary; and so oft repeated was the fact of such recognition that it may be said to have become the common law of Congress to so act in according recognition of rights to the people and Statehood to Territories.

In the days when these things were done the Democratic party did not plant itself in opposition thereto. On the contrary, it went right on, not only aiding but leading in the creation of the line of precedents to which I have referred. It was not the custom of that party then to insist that the right of petition of the inhabitants of a Territory could be exercised only in pursuance of the terms of an enabling act passed by Congress. It did not then seem to occur to it that the constitutional right of the people to assemble and consult about their interests and grievances was subject to the limitation that Congress should first enact a law authorizing them so to do. No such idea was entertained; but, on the contrary, many of the most forceful leaders of that party affirmed that whenever the population of a Territory equaled in number the ratio fixed by law as the basis of representation the right at once attached to organize a form of State government; and that upon this being done it became the duty of Congress to admit the new State into the Union on an equal footing with the other States. In support of this doctrine the Democratic party practically was a unit prior to the Kansas-Nebraska contest, in which the slave power sought to arrest the multiplication of free States. State after State was admitted into the Union in pursuance of this doctrine. Nor did any disaster ever result from such admission of States.

What more loyal, patriotic, progressive, and prosperous States can be named than Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, and Oregon, each of which entered the Union by the door which that doctrine opened? If it was sound doctrine then, why is it not now? If it was good for the Territories of Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, Oregon, and others, and justified their admission into the Union as States equal with all others, why is it not good for Dakota, whose petition is now before us? Is there any peculiar reason to be found in the political conditions of the period to which the cases mentioned belong why the Democratic party affirmed and enforced the doctrine I have stated? Was the doctrine the result of statesmanship's considerate care for the right of petition, the public good, and the general welfare, or was it a convenient expedient and an insincere resort of a narrow partisanship subordinating a high and definite official duty to the temporary fortunes and necessities of the Democratic party? Did it have no other or higher significance than partisan effort to prolong party power? Was it only because in the times when the precedents named were enacted the people of the Territories allied themselves with the Democratic party and promised additional strength to it in both Houses of Congress, and especially in the Senate? If not, then why shall it not now accomplish for Dakota what it then did for the other cases I have cited?

Does not the Dakota case present all of the proper elements involved in the other cases? In territorial extent surely Dakota is great enough. If 55,000 square miles were sufficient for Iowa, it would seem that 77,000 square miles ought to be regarded as enough for Dakota. In the matter of population Iowa had but little more than the number then fixed by law as the representative ratio. The population of Dakota is equal to twice the present ratio, and would entitle her to two Representatives. The settlements of Iowa were confined to the eastern fourth of her territory. Those of Dakota extend from border to border. Iowa was isolated, and her people sent nothing to the markets which found its way into our foreign commerce to aid in establishing a balance in our favor against the rest of the world. The railroad system has intervened since that time, and Dakota is in close communication with the commerce of the world, and her wheat product alone forms no inconsiderable element thereof. Indeed, in every respect the case which Dakota presents to us is more nearly in harmony with the present wondrous conditions of this country than was that of Iowa with those existing at the date of her admission into the Union. In all of the elements essential to Statehood Dakota presents a case which she may safely challenge all of the precedents of the past to match. And in the preparation of her case she has been orderly and conservative. She assumes no revolutionary attitude. She has set up no authority in hostility to the Government of the United States. She presents her petition and submits her proposed constitution of government for our inspection, and in it she has expressly provided that:

Nothing in this constitution or schedule contained shall be construed to authorize the Legislature to exercise any powers except such as are necessary to its organization, to elect United States Senators, to provide and pass means and measures necessary, preliminary, and incident to admission to the Union, and to assemble and reassemble and adjourn from time to time; neither to authorize any officer of the executive or administrative departments to exercise any powers of his office except such as may be preliminary and incident to admission to the Union; nor to authorize any officer of the judiciary department to exercise any of the duties of his office until the State of Dakota shall have been regularly admitted into the Union, except such as may be authorized by the Congress of the United States.

Is this the language of revolutionists? Does it read like a revolutionary pronunciamento emanating from a turbulent community? Is it not respectful, orderly, conservative, and in every way proper? The people who sent it here had the constitutional right to assemble, consult, and petition. These things they have done, and no more. Why shall they not be met by Congress in the spirit in which they come to it? Why shall they be treated differently from those who have come here before with like cases? Is there anything in recently projected political philosophy which requires Dakota to submit to rules of exclusion which have not been applied to the State movements of other Territories? Is the new system of political ethics labeled "offensive partisanship" to be expanded and applied to great communities as well as to individuals? Is no Territory to be admitted as a State, no matter what the elements of population, development, progress, wealth, and other desirable conditions may be presented in support of its petition, unless it comes with a promise to support the Democratic party and send members of that political organization as Senators and Representatives to Congress? Have we arrived at a juncture in the political history of the country when the Democratic party is engaged in writing commentaries explanatory of its former conduct relative to the admission of new States into the Union? And are we to learn from these commentaries that it admitted them then because they came clothed with the garb of Democracy, and that it will oppose Dakota now for the reason that she is Republican as a Territory and may be such as a State? Is this the statesmanship which the new political philosophy has evolved; the spirit of the new system of political ethics? We hear much of reform. Is this one of its results? If this be so, then will much needed light begin to shine upon and explain many of the curious things around which plays the oft-repeated phrase, "A public office is a public trust." A public office is not a mere place, position, or station. It is organized duty. When the offices and the duties are aggregated they constitute the active life and force of the Government; and the trust involved is for the public good and the general welfare. But the new philosophy denies this, it would seem, and affirms that a public office is a trust for the benefit of the Democratic party, and whosoever or whatsoever denies this is an "offensive partisan," whether an individual or the population of a Territory. And this is reform!

Mr. President, if I am not reading this case aright, wherein am I at fault? I am not mistaken in my statements relative to the action of the Democratic party in the matter of the admission of new States into the Union, nor does it seem to me that any one can fail to detect the hostility of that party to the admission of Dakota. Is there any other reason for the changed attitude of the party than the one which statesmanship rejects and partisanship adopts? Certainly the reason for the change can not be found in the results which have come to the country from the cases which I have mentioned of the admission of new States without resort to a Congressional enabling act. Have not the States which I have named been true to the Union of which they are members? Have they not all grown into forceful Commonwealths? Was it a mistake to admit them as Dakota now asks to be admitted? If so, wherein lies the mistake? Is it because they all became "offensive partisans" by joining the great column of Republican States? Why, even after doing this they, each and every one, have gone right on doing those things which make States great and adding to the strength and magnificence of the Republic. Take the State of Iowa as an example in this regard of the several Western States I have named. Notwithstanding her sterling qualities as a Republican State, she is no discredit to the Democratic Senators and Representatives in Congress whose votes admitted her into the Union in spite of the absence of an enabling act. Recently the Dubuque Herald, a leading Democratic paper of the State, and whose editor is postmaster at Dubuque and a member of the Democratic national committee, said, among other things, of Iowa:

The "war debt" is all paid off, and the State has no other debt. The State treasury has no demands upon it, except for current expenses. The State capitol, which is such a credit to the State, is now completed and paid for. A young State like Iowa is compelled to make provisions for her needs in a slow and experimental way.

This she has done, and done it carefully, safely, and well. Our rate of State taxation, which is less than that of almost any other State in the Union, only 2½ mills for all purposes, has been sufficient to pay off the war debt; to build and pay for a magnificent capitol, on which an average of over $200,000 a year has been expended during the past fifteen years; the Agricultural College has been endowed and put on a safe footing; the various State institutions have been both paid for and liberally maintained; in fact there is nothing now wanting but an endowment by the Legislature for the State University.

This Democratic editor might have said relative to the State University that it is already well endowed and splendidly equipped for the work of one of the foremost educational institutions, which it is; and that the endowment, of which he wrote and favored, is involved in a proposition to add to the existing one a million of dollars by the State. And he might have added relative to the educational efforts of the State that they have resulted in placing her percentage of illiteracy, as shown by the census taken this year, below that of any other member of the Union; and he might have repeated the story of the national census of 1880 concerning her moral conditions, wherein it is shown that her criminals number only 1 to each 2,003 of total inhabitants of the State, and in this respect stands unequaled by any other State. Nor would he then have half told the beautiful and forceful story of the State's progress and true condition. And yet, as I have already stated, this presentation of Iowa is but an illustrative example of the several Western States that have been admitted into the Union under the former practice of the Democratic party and without the aid of an enabling act of Congress. Revolutionary movements and proceedings do not flourish in such States. Their inhabitants know too well the value of order and they enforce it. And here let us keep in mind that the population of Dakota is in large part from these orderly and prosperous States. Iowa and Minnesota have supplied a heavy percentage of the population of Dakota; and what those States are in respect of the elements and conditions which evidence force, progress, prosperity, and power will be repeated in Dakota.

Mr. President, the people who have settled the Territories of the West and developed them into the great States they now are have heretofore been allowed great freedom of action in effecting their wonderful work. That they have best known their own needs, and have had perfect comprehension of their local surroundings, and accurate appreciation of their relations with the general movements which have brought this Republic to the commanding position it now occupies among the nations, is demonstrated by the present magnificent conditions attending them. It may be that the freedom of action accorded them in the earlier stages of their endeavors by the Democratic party was the outgrowth of partisan purpose in the minds of the leaders of that political organization; but the people immediately concerned took little account of this, as is evidenced by the withdrawal of their support of that party in their resolute efforts to care for and develop the best conditions of government in their several communities. They had their faces set toward a brighter and better future for their communities than could come through the manipulations of public affairs for mere partisan gain, and on this line the people of Dakota are now moving. Any political party which opposes their advance because they may not now be in sympathy with its purposes will have occasion to recognize its own mistake. The practice of wrestling on the "catch-as-catch-can" plan for partisan ends with political problems and popular rights, such as are involved in this Dakota case, will never long promote the purposes of those who engage in it. No careful student of the political history of this country will dispute this statement. The current of our public affairs is never long diverted from its direct course by mere partisan obstructions. In no part of our history is this truth more perfectly demonstrated than in that which relates to the Western Territories and States. Let us not now be unmindful of what that history teaches. Dakota has pages in that history. They disclose that her movements thus far are as constitutional and forceful and orderly in carrying her toward Statehood as any that appear in the history of other Territories. They are as strictly in keeping with the present conditions of our country as were those of other Territories in their times. In every aspect of the case she is entitled to admission into the Union. She rests solidly on the doctrines of the preceding cases. Let no supposed party interest reject her petition. Rather let us rise to that higher plane of public duty where the general welfare is conserved by prompt recognition of the rights of the people concerned, accept the hand of Dakota, and welcome her to the sisterhood of States.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 392) declaring forfeited certain grants of land made to certain States in aid of the construction of railroads, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE ELLWOOD.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, transmitted to the Senate the resolutions adopted by the House on the death of Hon. REUBEN ELLWOOD, late a member of that body from the State of Illinois.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the honorable Senator from Missouri to yield to me that I may call up resolutions which have come from the House of Representatives to-day in relation to the death of one of my colleagues in that body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri having the floor on the pending bill, the Senator from Illinois asks for the consideration of resolutions from the House of Representatives.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the resolutions be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be read.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 28, 1886.

Resolved, That this House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. REUBEN ELLWOOD, late a member of this House from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk of this House to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the Senate.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased this House do now adjourn.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, on day before yesterday this honorable Senate put aside its ordinary legislative duties to spend a brief time in paying a just tribute of respect to the memory of Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States, who but recently presided over the deliberations of this body.

To-day I ask the Senate to pause for a little time while a few weak words may be spoken of the life and character of the late REUBEN ELLWOOD, who at the time of his death was an honored member of the other branch of this Congress. Mr. ELLWOOD was perhaps less known to fame than some others of the dead and living who have served the country, but there have been none more worthy of honor as a citizen and patriot.

REUBEN ELLWOOD died at his house in Sycamore, in Illinois, on the 1st day of July, 1885, surrounded by his loving family and friends. The story of his life and career is not an unusual one in this land of free institutions, where success and honorable position depend upon personal merit rather than upon the adventitious circumstances of birth and fortune, but it is instructive and will bear repetition.

He was born in the State of New York, in Minden, Montgomery County, February 17, 1821, and was in his sixty-fifth year at the time of his death. It was my good fortune, Mr. President, to know Mr. ELLWOOD well for several years before his first election to the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress in 1882; and, sir, the more I saw and knew of him the stronger became my attachment for him. In many respects he was a remarkable man, full of energy, determined in purpose, unswerving in carrying out his convictions of duty, full of love for his country and its free institutions, fond of business, with a large capacity for commercial affairs, and, with all these qualities, possessing a heart which beat in harmony with the heart of the working people of America, and which made him especially kind to those with whom he labored and upon whom he depended for business success.

He was a man of power in head and heart and hand. Being such, he was the recognized leader in his county in business, in politics, and, whenever occasion demanded, action by the people. From boyhood he was of robust physique, active and vigorous, and inspired with that necessary element of ambition which is requisite to press men to the front in the discharge of important duty.

At the early age of sixteen the young lad determined to carve out his own fortune, and left his home and took up his abode in the county in Illinois in which he resided at the time of his death. He entered 160 acres of land, and for several years hired by the month to farmers in the neighborhood until his health failed him, when he was forced to return to the home of his parents in New York. Becoming satisfied from his brief contact with the outside world that he needed a better educational training than he had received, the young man entered a seminary near his early home, and, as a student, manifested a determination to better qualify himself for the struggle of life. After leaving school he resolved to devote himself to a business career. To get a start he engaged in agricultural pursuits, and followed that occupation for several years until he was able to become also a manufacturer. In 1857 he returned to Illinois and engaged in business pursuits, and in 1870 he began the manufacture of agricultural implements in his own town, an occupation in which he continued until his death. By his energy, enterprise, and capacity for affairs he was enabled to build up a large business. He constructed extensive buildings and gave employment to many men, and his manufacturing works were considered of great value and importance to the public in his section of the State.

Mr. ELLWOOD was a man of positive convictions, and was therefore a strong partisan. He believed with all his soul that the political organization to which he belonged was in the right, and never shrank from defending it and its principles with force and candor and with such enthusiasm as to produce lasting impressions. His interest in public affairs led him into political campaigns, and finally into the General Assembly of the State of New York, even before he left that State as a young man. He was a Republican by nature. He hated oppression and slavery and loved liberty. He was fully identified with the party of free soil, and was a delegate to its national convention which nominated Frémont in 1856. He was intensely interested and anxious for his country in the late great struggle in which the integrity of the Union and the freedom of the slave were involved, and was always active in every movement for the public good, believing in and acting upon the principle that he does best for himself who does best for his fellow-citizens.

In 1868 Mr. ELLWOOD was the unanimous choice of his county for Representative in Congress. In 1882 he was the choice of his district, and was elected by about 8,000 majority over his opponent. In 1884 he was the unanimous choice of his party, being renominated without a dissenting voice in town caucus, in county conventions, or in the Congressional convention, and was re-elected by more than 11,000 majority. He had the entire confidence of the people of his district, and represented them with ability and fidelity. He served on important committees and performed his official work with signal devotion to duty and with an eye single to the best interests of the whole people. Before entering Congress he held various offices of public trust at the hands of his friends at home and from the national administration, and no man could say that he did not discharge his duties honestly and ably in whatever position he held.

In his domestic relations Mr. ELLWOOD'S life was especially worthy of commendation and emulation, and pleasantly illustrates the strength of his character. He was not only all that a husband and father should be, but was also the trusted leader and chosen adviser of his five brothers, all of whom resided near him. By his wise counsel and strong personal influence this large family was always united and was enabled to make its power felt in all business and public affairs. Of these six stalwart men he, the acknowledged head, was the first to pass to his reward.

Such, Mr. President, are some of the prominent facts connected with the career of the late REUBEN ELLWOOD. The last time, sir, that it was my privilege to look him in the face and take him by the hand was when he came into this Chamber one day last spring with a telegram in his hand. With tears coursing down his face and with quivering lips he told me the contents of the telegram—that his grandson was dead and he must go home—and asked me to take care of certain measures in which his constituents were interested. The little boy who had suddenly sickened and died had become as one of his own family, and he had set his heart on educating the lad and giving him every opportunity for an honorable career. Death swept away all his plans and took the boy he loved so well to his long home. Congress soon adjourned and Mr. ELLWOOD did not return. It was not long until he, too, strong and robust as he seemed to be, was stricken down, and soon the news was spread that REUBEN ELLWOOD was dead.

Conscious and brave to the last moment, his last words were uttered in an effort to cheer his weeping family, saying to them, "It is all right," and in a moment closing his eyes in death. His death, Mr. President, was a great loss to the State which he in part represented in the other branch of Congress and to the whole country. It was most keenly felt in his home district, where he was best known. He was a good citizen, an honest man, and a pure patriot. What more need be said of any man? While he was often called to places of honor and trust, yet he was distinctively a man of business. Few public men can combine public service and private business in such a manner as to serve the public faithfully and well and at the same time carry on private business successfully. Yet this Mr. ELLWOOD was able to do. He was a producer, and added to the comfort and wealth of the country. The man who does something that lightens the burdens of the laboring man or woman, who contributes to the comfort of his fellows, and at the same time adds to the wealth of his country, is a benefactor, and is entitled to higher consideration than is the man who lives alone upon the toil and sweat of his fellow-men. With Mr. ELLWOOD labor was a delight and necessary in his opinion to an honorable life. He recognized no rank among men except upon the basis of integrity, intelligence, and industry. In the estimation of Mr. ELLWOOD, the man who toiled for his day's wages, who earned his bread by the sweat of his face, and lived an upright and sober life carried the stamp of manhood upon his brow and was the peer of any other citizen. He believed in work—that every man should have something to do, and do it to the best of his ability. He had no respect for the idler—the man who could but would not work.

But, Mr. President, I will not speak longer. REUBEN ELLWOOD sleeps in the silent tomb, in sight of the home where he left a beloved wife overwhelmed with grief and sons and daughters sorrowing for their departed father. Sad dispensations come almost daily to remind us that our time at most is short and that the grave is the resting-place of all. I know of no better standpoint from which to witness and realize more fully the rapid march of men to the tomb than from a seat in this Senate. But a few hundred men represent the legislative branch of the National Government, and yet no winter passes by in which we are not called upon to pause from our daily work to announce the death of some honorable member of one or the other House. It seems to be almost certain that some one or more of those composing the Congress of the United States must in every year pass away. This fact is an admonition to each one of us to "be ye also ready."

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the following resolutions, which I now offer:

Resolved, That the Senate receives with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. REUBEN ELLWOOD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Illinois, and tenders to the family and relatives of the deceased the assurance of its sympathy in their bereavement.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit to the family of Mr. ELLWOOD a copy of the foregoing resolution.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, it is fitting that I should add a word to what has been so well said by my colleague in reference to our associate in the other House who has passed away, REUBEN ELLWOOD. In a word, sir, I can say that he was a man for the position for which his constituents selected him well qualified and equipped in every respect. He was a man honored among his neighbors and respected wherever he was known. He was recognized as a man of great energy, a man of great strength of intellect, a man of business qualifications, a man who amassed a fortune by his own efforts and his own industry. He was a charitable man withal. All of his neighbors are witnesses to his kindness, his generosity, and his great charity to those who were suffering and in distress.

He left the Congress of the United States at its adjournment last spring in good health. He sickened and died at home. He is mourned by all who know him. In the death of REUBEN ELLWOOD his district and the State of Illinois lost an able and an efficient representative of the interests of that district and State.

Sir, these things, occurring so frequently as they do, as was well said, ought to remind us that in the midst of life we are in death, and that we are all moving to that "undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveler returns;" and the only hope is that in passing from this life we may receive that which is considered a great reward for those who perform their duties toward man and God here on earth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for reference the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas section 3678 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides that all sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditures in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made, and for no others; and

Whereas it is represented that said section was violated in this, namely, that certain moneys heretofore appropriated by Congress for the carrying on of the Signal Service Bureau have been misapplied: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department be instructed to inquire whether the statute above referred to is now being obeyed, and whether or not it has heretofore been violated; and to report by bill or otherwise such measures as will secure its enforcement.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not pass that resolution now?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it should be adopted at once.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I request the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I rise to present a privileged report, which I send to the desk.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish for the information of this House a report of all balances due to and from the United States as shown by the books of the offices of the Register and Sixth Auditor of the Treasury Department from 1789 to the 30th day of June, 1885; that the Secretary of War and the Postmaster-General be directed to report all of said balances as shown by the books of their respective Departments.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the committee.

The substitute was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now proceed to call the committees for reports.

RESTORATION OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 53) to authorize the President to restore officers to the Army in certain cases; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that the minority of the committee have leave to present their views on this bill hereafter, to be printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. STEELE subsequently submitted the views of the minority.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call under the rule. The Chair will now proceed with the call of the committees for one hour for the designation of bills for present consideration. The hour begins at twenty-seven minutes after 12 o'clock p. m.

Mr. REESE. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to call up from the House Calendar for present consideration the joint resolution (H. Res. 71) authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia to supply plants and shrubs to fill certain vases in the Pension building.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to supply and keep supplied, from the public greenhouses and nurseries, the vases around the interior court of the Pension building with plants and shrubs suitable thereto.

Mr. REESE. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution is rendered necessary by the law which prohibits the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds from supplying plants and shrubs for any grounds except the public reservations. After considerable correspondence between the officials concerned, their construction of the law was that the erection of the Pension building, putting that portion of the reservation upon which it stands under cover, would deprive it of the right to be supplied with plants and shrubs, and this resolution is simply intended to authorize the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds to furnish such shrubs and plants as may be required for the purpose of filling the vases that ornament the interior of the Pension building.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, if there is a report accompanying that resolution it had better be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee having under consideration H. Res. 71, authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia to supply plants and shrubs to fill certain vases in the Pension building, having considered the same, report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REESE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY (when the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests was called). Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 4838) to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels, and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I appeal to the gentleman from Maine to yield to me simply to make a report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that during this hour, which is specially set apart by the rules for the consideration of bills, it is not in order to present reports. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] later.

The motion of Mr. DINGLEY was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of consiging the bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, as the bill is printed and is to be read and considered by sections under the five-minute rule, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of it in detail now be dispensed with. There was no objection and it was so ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to ask the consideration of this bill by sections?

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill be dispensed with, as it can be considered best under the five-minute rule. There will be full opportunity for its thorough discussion, as it covers a wide variety of detail.

Mr. REAGAN. What is the bill?

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Maine to answer a question before unanimous consent is given. Does this bill (which I have not had time to read) affect the fees of pilots?

Mr. DINGLEY. It does not. It does not relate to pilots.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. I wish to know whether we can not have this bill read before consent is given to dispense with general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] that by unanimous consent the reading of the bill has been dispensed with.

Mr. ROGERS. Then I object. If the bill can not be read so that we can know what it is, I shall object to dispensing with general debate.

Mr. DINGLEY. The bill is to be read by sections and considered in detail.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman from Maine will give consent that the bill shall be read I will withdraw my objection; otherwise I must insist upon it.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, the committee which reported this bill may understand it, but members generally do not, and certainly we ought not to be asked to go into the discussion until the bill has been read and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has explained it.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to dispensing with general debate.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think that if the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] will listen to a brief explanation from me he will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. If I can have the attention of the House for a few moments I will state the effect of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Maine. Can not the vote dispensing with the reading of the bill be reconsidered? Let the bill be read, and then we can dispose of the whole matter intelligently.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will withdraw any objection on my part, and will ask that the vote to dispense with reading the bill in full may be reconsidered.

Mr. REED, of Maine (to Mr. DINGLEY). Let the bill be read in your time.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will ask the Clerk to read the bill in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill in the time of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. ROGERS. I have not withdrawn my objection yet. I want to hear the bill read before I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. That is understood.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman from Maine now has the floor for the purpose of general debate, and he proposes to have the bill read in his time.

Mr. DINGLEY. The reading of the bill in full was dispensed with; but as the gentleman from Arkansas desires now that it be read, I ask the Clerk to read it in my time.

Mr. ROGERS. But we may desire to object to its being considered without general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. That question will come up afterward.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am willing that we have general debate.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill in the time of the gentleman from Maine.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That on and after July 1, 1886, no fees shall be charged or collected by collectors or other officers of customs, or by inspectors of steam-vessels or shipping commissioners, for the following services to vessels of the United States, to wit: Measurement of tonnage and certifying the same; issuing of license or granting of certificate of registry, record, or enrollment, including all indorsements on the same and bond and oath; indorsement of change of master; certifying and receiving manifest, including master's oath, and granting permits; granting certificate of payment of tonnage dues; recording bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance, or the discharge of such mortgage or hypothecation; furnishing certificate of title; furnishing the crew-list, including bond; certificate of protection to seamen; bill of health; shipping or discharging of seamen, as provided by title 53 of the Revised Statutes and section 2 of this act; apprenticing boys to the merchant service; inspecting, examining, and licensing steam-vessels, including inspection certificate and copies thereof; and licensing of master, engineer, pilot, or mate of a vessel; and all provisions of laws authorizing or requiring the collection of fees for such services are repealed, such repeal to take effect July 1, 1886. Collectors or other officers of customs, inspectors of steam-vessels, and shipping commissioners who are paid wholly or partly by fees shall make a detailed report of such services, and the fees provided by law, to the Secretary of the Treasury, under such regulations as that officer may prescribe; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall allow said officers such compensation for said services as each would have received prior to the passage of this act: Provided, That such services have, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, been necessarily rendered.

SEC. 2. That shipping commissioners may ship and discharge crews for any vessel engaged in the coastwise trade, or the trade between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, or Newfoundland, or the West Indies, or the Republic of Mexico, at the request of the master or owner of such vessel, the shipping and discharging fees in such cases to be one-half that prescribed by section 4612 of the Revised Statutes, for the purpose of determining the compensation of shipping commissioners.

SEC. 3. That section 10 of the act entitled "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884, be amended by inserting after the word "relative," in line 19, the following: "Or to an original creditor in liquidation of any just debt for board or clothing which he may have contracted prior to engagement, not exceeding one month's pay for board and one month's pay for clothing." And said section 10 is further amended by striking out all of the last paragraph after the words "vessels of the United States," and inserting in lieu of such words stricken out the following: "And any master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel who has violated this section shall be liable to the same penalty that the master, owner, or agent of a vessel of the United States would be for a similar violation."

SEC. 4. That section 4289 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4289. The provisions of the seven preceding sections, and of section 18 of an act entitled 'An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying-trade, and for other purposes,' approved June 26, 1884, relating to the limitations of the liability of the owners of vessels, shall apply to all sea-going vessels, and also to all vessels used on lakes or rivers or in inland navigation, but shall not apply to any canal-boat, barge, or lighter."

SEC. 5. That section 4153 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the last sentence of the last paragraph, and inserting instead the following: "In every vessel documented as a vessel of the United States the number denoting her net tonnage shall be deeply carved or otherwise permanently marked on her main beam, and shall be so continued; and if the number at any time cease to be continued, such vessel shall be subject to a fine of $30 on every arrival in a port of the United States if she have not her tonnage number legally carved or permanently marked."

SEC. 6. That from the close of section 4177 of said statutes the following words shall be stricken out, to wit: "Such vessel shall be no longer recognized as a vessel of the United States;" and in lieu thereof there shall be inserted the words following: "Such vessel shall be liable to a fine of $30 on every arrival in a port of the United States if she have not her proper official number legally carved or permanently marked."

SEC. 7. That section 4371 of said statutes is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof the following provisions shall be inserted: "Every vessel of 20 tons or upwards, entitled to be documented as a vessel of the United States, other than registered vessels, found trading between district and district, or between different places in the same district, or carrying on the fishery, without being enrolled and licensed, and every vessel of less than 20 tons and not less than 5 tons burden found trading or carrying on the fishery as aforesaid without a license obtained as provided by this title, shall be liable to a fine of $30 at every port of arrival without such enrollment or license. But if the license shall have expired while the vessel was at sea, and there shall have been no opportunity to renew such license, then said fine of $30 shall not be incurred."

SEC. 8. That foreign vessels found transporting passengers between places or ports in the United States, when such passengers have been taken on board in the United States, shall be liable to a fine of $1 for every passenger landed.

SEC. 9. That the fines imposed by sections 5, 6, 7, and 8 of this act shall be subject to remission or mitigation by the Secretary of the Treasury when the offense was not willfully committed, under such methods of ascertaining the facts as may seem to him advisable.

SEC. 10. That the provision of Schedule N of "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1883, allowing a drawback on bituminous coal used for fuel on vessels propelled by steam, shall be construed to apply only to vessels of the United States, and to vessels of foreign countries granting similar privilege to vessels of the United States in their ports.

SEC. 11. That section 14 of "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying-trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That in lieu of the tax on tonnage of 30 cents per ton per annum imposed prior to July 1, 1884, a duty of 3 cents per ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 15 cents per ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from any foreign port or place in North America, Central America, the West India Islands, the Bahama Islands, the Bermuda Islands, or the Sandwich Islands, or Newfoundland; and a duty of 6 cents per ton, not to exceed 30 cents per ton per annum, is hereby imposed on each entry upon all vessels which shall be entered in the United States from any other foreign ports: Provided, That the President of the United States shall suspend the collection of so much of the duty herein imposed on vessels entered from any foreign port as may be in excess of the tonnage and light-house dues, or other equivalent tax or taxes, imposed in said port on American vessels by the government of the foreign country in which such port is situated, and shall, upon the passage of this act, and from time to time thereafter as often as it may become necessary by reason of changes in the laws of the foreign countries above mentioned, indicate by proclamation the ports to which such suspension shall apply, and the rate or rates of tonnage duty, if any, to be collected under such suspension: And provided further, That such proclamation shall exclude from the benefits of the suspension herein authorized the vessels of any foreign country in whose ports the fees or dues of any kind or nature imposed on vessels of the United States, or the import or export duties on their cargoes, are in excess of the fees, dues, or duties imposed on the vessels of the country in which such port is situated, or on the cargoes of such vessels; and sections 4223 and 4224, and so much of section 4219 of the Revised Statutes as conflicts with this section, are hereby repealed."

SEC. 12. That the President be, and hereby is, directed to cause the governments of foreign countries which, at any of their ports, impose on American vessels a tonnage-tax or light-house dues, or other equivalent tax or taxes, or any other fees, charges, or dues, to be informed of the provisions of the preceding section, and invited to co-operate with the Government of the United States in abolishing all light-house dues, tonnage-taxes, or other equivalent tax or taxes on, and also all other fees for official services to, the vessels of the respective nations employed in the trade between the ports of such foreign country and the ports of the United States.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, as the hour of 1 o'clock to-day has been assigned by the House for the delivery of addresses upon the death of Hon. Mr. ELLWOOD, late a Representative in this House from the State of Illinois, I shall have only two or three minutes to-day to begin the explanation of this bill. I hope to occupy altogether not more than ten or fifteen minutes, in which time I desire, if I can have the attention of the House, to present very briefly the salient points in connection with the bill.

This bill has been unanimously reported from the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests. It comprises only those provisions for the removal of certain fees, charges, and burdens on American vessels upon which the committee are entirely agreed. The first section of the bill provides that on and after the 1st of July next certain fees imposed by law on vessels of the United States for the services of collectors and other officers of customs, inspectors of steam-vessels, and shipping commissioners shall be abolished. And in order not to disturb the compensation of any one of these officials, it is provided that these services shall be returned in detail to the Secretary of the Treasury, and that he shall allow compensation to each of these officers precisely as though this act had not passed.

The fees to be abolished are those imposed only upon vessels of the United States, and they aggregate about $300,000—$110,000 being, so far as we can estimate, the fees of inspectors of steam-vessels; $150,000 being the fees of collectors and other officers of customs for documenting vessels and certain other services for American vessels; and about $40,000 being for services of shipping commissioners in shipping and discharging seamen of American vessels. So that in removing these fees we do to that extent indirectly aid the vessels of the United States.

Two reasons have operated on the minds of the committee in bringing this first section before the House: First, that the services required in connection with vessels in each of these cases for which fees are charged are services not primarily for the advantage or benefit of the vessel itself, but for the protection of the revenue of the United States and for the protection of the public interests, the committee holding that services thus performed ought not in this case to be a charge upon the vessel; and secondly, that by abolishing these fees we may to that extent afford an indirect aid to the American merchant marine.

Now, if there are any questions that any gentleman desires to put for the further elucidation of this first section I would be glad to make any necessary explanation before proceeding further.

Mr. STORM. I would like to ask a question in regard to the eleventh section.

Mr. DINGLEY. As I shall in my explanation take up the several sections in their order, I hope questions will be confined to each section as I proceed.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman has already stated, I believe, that the amount of revenue to be remitted is about $200,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. About $300,000.

Mr. HEWITT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman will pardon me. I am admonished that the hour fixed for the eulogies upon the late Mr. ELLWOOD has arrived. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, retaining my right to occupy the floor hereafter for the residue of my time, I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4838) to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels, and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DEATH OF HON. REUBEN ELLWOOD.

Mr. HOPKINS (at 1 o'clock p. m.). Mr. Speaker, this is the hour fixed by the order of the House for considering the resolutions now pending before this body relating to the death of my predecessor, Hon. REUBEN ELLWOOD; and I ask for their reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. REUBEN ELLWOOD, late a member of this House from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk of the House to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the Senate; and

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased this House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, since the election of the members of this House to the Forty-ninth Congress the messenger of death has visited their number and taken one from among them in the person of my lamented predecessor, Hon. REUBEN ELLWOOD.

In the early hours of the morning, on the 1st day of July, 1885, after a long and painful struggle with that grim destroyer, Death, he yielded to his fate, acknowledged his conqueror, and peacefully and quietly as a sleeping babe passed over "the dark waters which roll round all the world." In his death the people of the fifth district of Illinois have lost a firm friend, a wise and conscientious legislator, an upright citizen, and an open-hearted, generous man.

Mr. ELLWOOD was born in Minden, Montgomery County, New York, February 17, 1821. His parents were Abraham and Sarah (De Long) Ellwood. They were poor, and with a large family of children to support, the subject of my remarks was early in life thrown upon his own resources for a livelihood.

In his boyhood the magnificent common-school system, which is the glory of the State he had the honor in part to represent on this floor, and which to-day opens the avenues to educational distinction in his native State to the plowman's son as well as the millionaire's, was unknown. The teacher who could explain the mysteries of multiplication and division, solve a problem in simple fractions, and work to the rule of three, was regarded as eminently well qualified to instruct the youth of that day.

Mr. ELLWOOD easily mastered these rudiments of an education, and, being possessed of a strong, healthy body and vigorous, restless mind, at the early age of fifteen years longingly turned his gaze toward the broad and beautiful prairies of Illinois as opening a better field for his ambition.

In 1837, before he had attained his sixteenth birthday, he made the journey from his home in New York to De Kalb County, Illinois.

In these days of the steam-engine, the telegraph, and palace coaches such a journey seems but a slight undertaking. Not so then, however. The "covered wagon" was the passenger coach of that day, and with such a conveyance he made this journey.

There is an element of heroism in the brave and fearless manner in which at this age he took up the burdens of life, turned his back resolutely upon all the endearing scenes of childhood, and, with the blessings of his father and mother, joined the number who have converted the great prairies of that then far-off Western State into fruitful fields and dotted them all over with beautiful villages and thriving cities. The first twelve months he passed in Illinois were as a farm-hand for one William Miller, of Kingston, De Kalb County. His second year there he was engaged in building a dam across Fox River, at Geneva, in the adjoining county of Kane. We next find him at work in a brick-yard in what is now the city of Rockford. He entered a claim for one hundred and sixty acres of land near Sycamore, in De Kalb County, and continued in various kinds of manual labor for about four years. At the end of this period, in somewhat impaired health, he returned to New York. His experience in the West and among men had taught him the importance of a more thorough education, and shortly after his return home he became a student of Cherry Valley Academy, which at that time was one of the best educational institutions of its kind in that part of the State. He never graduated. After a short time at that Academy he went to Glenville, Schenectady County, and engaged first in the mill and lumber trade; then in the cultivation of broom-corn and the manufacture of brooms. He continued in this business for seven or eight years, and was so successful that at one time he employed as many as one hundred and thirty men.

Mr. ELLWOOD returned to Illinois in 1857, and from that time until his death was closely identified with the material interests of the city and county in which he lived. He engaged for a time in the hardware trade in Sycamore, and in connection with that dealt in farm machinery. His quick and comprehensive mind readily detected incompleteness and imperfection in these machines for the purposes for which they were designed, and being of an ingenious turn of mind he invented, patented, and applied to them various devices and improvements. This naturally led him into the manufacture of machines and different kinds of farm implements. For many years before his death he was interested in the largest manufactories in De Kalb County. As a business man he had few equals and no superiors in the section in which he lived. It would be uninteresting to go into the details of his business career and recite the different enterprises in which he was engaged during the various periods of his life and which affected the material prosperity of the beautiful city of Sycamore, his home for more than a quarter of a century. In his death the people who knew him all these years have met with a great if not irreparable loss.

Mr. ELLWOOD was married in 1849 to Miss Eleanor Vedder, of Schenectady. Six children blessed this union. His married life was a fortunate and happy one. And now the widow and four of these children live to mourn the loss of a kind and faithful husband, a loving and indulgent father.

Though not an educated man in the books, he was a keen and close observer of men, and had what no schools can give—the very genius of common sense. It was this that made him the successful business man that he was, in spite of his indifferent education. The name of Ellwood is as closely interwoven in the history of De Kalb County and its development and prosperity as that of any family that ever lived within the limits of its rich territory. He and his brothers and sisters formed a most remarkable family. There were seven boys and four girls, all, as you saw Mr. ELLWOOD on this floor, large and robust. Five of his brothers settled with him in De Kalb County—all big-framed and big-brained men.

Together they formed a most conspicuous group, and REUBEN ELLWOOD was their recognized and acknowledged leader. But there was a warm and fraternal feeling which always united them, the remembrance of which must now be a source of comfort to the survivors as they think of him whom they delighted to honor sleeping his quiet sleep of death.

Mr. ELLWOOD from his earliest years took a deep interest in politics. His first experience in office was that of representative in the New York Assembly in 1851. His sympathies and every aspiration of his intense nature were in accord with those principles of human liberty which were promulgated to the country in the formation of the Republican party. He was sent as a delegate to the Republican convention at Philadelphia in 1856 which nominated Frémont, and from that day to the close of his busy life was a firm and enthusiastic supporter of that party. He was not an office-seeker, but ever ready and willing to help a friend. Whenever he appeared in political gatherings his born leadership was felt and acknowledged.

I remember attending a State convention held in Springfield, Ill., some years since, in which he was a delegate from De Kalb County. He came to the convention in the interest of a fellow-townsman who wished to be nominated for clerk of the supreme court. A number of candidates were ambitious for the same position, and when the delegates from the different parts of the State were assembled it looked very doubtful as to whether Mr. ELLWOOD'S candidate would receive the nomination. It was at that critical moment in such conventions when natural leadership asserts itself that Mr. ELLWOOD rose to his feet and in a five-minute speech, which I think I have never heard surpassed for force and eloquence, shattered all opposition and triumphantly carried the nomination for his friend.

As advancing years began to remind him of the approach of old age he had an ambition to round out a successfull business career with a few terms in Congress. That ambition was gratified by the votes of the people of his district in 1882. So well had he performed the duties of this new position that in 1884 he was renominated without opposition and was re-elected by largely increased majorities in all the counties of his district. What his services were here and how he was regarded by his associates I leave for those to tell who had the honor to serve with him in the Forty-eighth Congress.

In private life he was just, temperate, and faithful to all his obligations. He was a good neighbor and a kind friend. In his domestic relations he was what makes home a heaven. He had the courage of his convictions, and like all men of that mentality had his opponents and detractors. But the grave buries all differences and seals the lips of defamers. His last sickness and his death fully demonstrated the strong traits of his character. He watched the progress of his disease with a keen and intelligent interest and courageously fought its advancement; but when he became convinced that his end was near, obeying the divine injunction, he put his house in order and awaited his final dissolution with firmness.

Death had no terrors for him. And as his devoted brothers and sisters and weeping wife and children pressed around his bed to catch the last intelligent words of the dying man, with a long and steadfast look into the great future he whispered back the cheering words, "It is all right; it is all right." Mr. Speaker, so lived and died a man whom the people of the fifth district of Illinois will long remember and honor.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it was not my good fortune to have known the late REUBEN ELLWOOD, member-elect of this body, personally until after his election as a member of the Forty-eighth Congress. And yet, with his kindly and generous nature, our first meeting seemed to be the meeting of old-time acquaintances and friends, and I very soon learned to respect and love him for his many noble and manly qualities.

But, Mr. Speaker, while I did not know Mr. ELLWOOD personally before we met as Representatives in Congress from our State, he was not unknown to me by reputation; and I feel justified in saying that he was not only a man of high character and standing, but he was one of the foremost citizens of the community in which, for so many years, he resided; and although he is dead, the workmanship of his hands and of his brains remains to remind his neighbors and friends of his active, useful life. Probably no other man had done more to build up and promote the prosperity of the city and county in which he lived and died than REUBEN ELLWOOD, and I am sure the death of no other citizen would have been more deeply deplored than his by the people generally at his own home and where he had expended the best energies of his life.

Mr. ELLWOOD came first to De Kalb County, Illinois, when a poor boy, at but fifteen or sixteen years of age, and settled near the present city of Sycamore, before it had even been laid out as a village. But after a few years, in which he worked as a laborer on a farm and in various other occupations, he returned to New York, his native State.

There he improved his education, engaged in active business, served a term as a member of the State Legislature, and in the year 1857 returned to De Kalb County, Illinois, and located permanently in Sycamore, then but a small village. Being much better equipped than he was before, he entered at once upon a life of great activity and usefulness, and by his integrity, his ability, and untiring industry and energy rose to the high and honorable position which as a private citizen and public servant he occupied at the time of his decease.

Mr. ELLWOOD was eminently a self-made man, and achieved his own success in life by integrity of purpose and fidelity to duty. We can well commend his life and character as a noble example of what, under the beneficence of our free institutions, can be accomplished by pluck and energy.

I have been much interested in hearing from his own lips some account of his earlier struggles. But in the last year of his life he was not free from trials. He suffered from some business adversities which overtook him, and perhaps from the general depression in the manufacturing interests of the country in which he was engaged, employing as he did a large number of men and a large amount of capital. And I remember well how anxious he was to preserve the integrity of his business character, and how he struggled to prevent the accumulations of his active, busy life from being swept away. It kept him away from his public duties here much of the time during the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress, and from his letters to me I know how deeply he regretted his absence, and how anxious he was that the interests of his constituents should not be neglected on account of such absence.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. ELLWOOD was not only an honorable man in his private life and business affairs, but he was a broad-minded, public-spirited, patriotic citizen. He loved his country and the community in which he lived and died with an earnest devotion; was proud of their growth and prosperity, and took a deep interest in all that would in his judgment promote the public welfare. As a Representative in Congress he discharged his duties intelligently and faithfully; and, I think, was especially attentive to the wants and interests of his own immediate constituents. He, being a new member, took no prominent part in the discussions of the House, but kept well posted in its proceedings, and had an intelligent understanding of the questions brought before it for consideration and determination. In his death his constituents and the country lost an able, faithful, and patriotic representative in this body.

Mr. Speaker, when the Forty-eighth Congress closed on the 4th of March last, REUBEN ELLWOOD was apparently in robust health and vigor, and gave promise of as long life as any of us. But he has fulfilled the law of our nature, and has passed away from earth forever. His death was a shock as well as a surprise to me, and I deeply deplored it, for I entertained high respect for him and for his many virtues and his sterling character.

The words we speak here, Mr. Speaker, in memory of our departed colleagues and friends may be but little heeded, but it is well for us to pause for a few moments in our proceedings to pay tribute to a faithful Representative and public servant and to extend our heartfelt sympathy to his widow and fatherless children in their great bereavement.

And while at this hour we honor the memory of my departed friend and colleague, REUBEN ELLWOOD, and remember in sympathy his family, let us not forget the name of JOSEPH RANKIN, another of our number who has been taken from us, and who to-day has been laid away at rest in his Wisconsin home. Peace to his memory also; and I trust all our hearts will go out in tender sympathy for his bereaved widow and his fatherless children left in their desolation. In concluding this brief tribute of respect to the memory of a departed friend and colleague for whom I cherished a very high regard, I will say that these lessons of our mortality have been frequently brought home to us since I have been a member of this body; and while we may not heed the words uttered here on these memorial occasions, it would be well for us to heed the lessons themselves, and let them so affect our minds and hearts as to lead us to nobler purposes in life.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I can not permit this melancholy occasion to pass without delivering my humble but sincere tribute to the worth of our late associate, REUBEN ELLWOOD.

I never knew him until we met in this Hall at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, but long before that Congress expired I had learned to admire and respect his manly qualities of head and heart.

We served upon the same Committee on Claims in that Congress, and just as it has been aptly said that the army in time of war is the best place in the world to find out a man's real character, so there is no better place in time of peace to discover a Congressman's true capacity and principles than on the Committee of Claims in this body.

In addition to passing upon hundreds of honest demands on the Government, that committee has to investigate thousands of conspiracies against the Treasury, suggested by fraud and supported by perjury. So onerous are the duties of the committee, that its faithful members are kept busy examining facts, or studying law all the while till the last day of the session, or listening to the prayerful importunities of claimants night and day. Then, too, the labors of the committee are like those of Sisyphus, in that a very large majority of the claims have to be gone over anew Congress after Congress, because this House has not the time to adjudicate them.

The man who can faithfully undergo such tread-mill service as this proves what sort of timber he is made of. Yet Mr. ELLWOOD stood the test without shirking any of the thankless petty drudgery. He always cheerfully took charge of his quota of cases for private investigation, and, except when unavoidably absent from sickness or real, not feigned business, he promptly attended every one of the numerous meetings of the committee to discuss and decide upon a report in each case.

It was at these meetings of the whole committee that Mr. ELLWOOD indelibly impressed himself upon his colleagues. His sound judgment, keen intelligence, high sense of justice, scorn of everything mean, as well as his moral courage, stood out in bold relief, proclaiming him every inch a man.

On several of these occasions when there was hot division in the committee on the merits of the pending claim I have heard him deliver as fine bursts of impromptu eloquence and logic as I ever listened to. Although no lawyer, he was well versed in the philosophy of ethics, and he was a profound judge of human nature. "Common sense and justice" were his favorite "legal authorities," as they are with all strong-minded self-taught men, and he often quoted them in the committee-room with telling effect. He likewise always presented his views with exceeding great modesty, which gave them additional weight. Remembering how successfully he generally maintained his positions in the committee, I asked him once why he did not talk to the House in the same way, to which he replied, "The House chills me"—a very unusual admission for a self-made man, because such men have to encounter and overcome so many obstacles in life that as a rule they are both rough and self-asserting in any presence.

Mr. ELLWOOD was a massive and robust man physically, mentally, and morally. There was nothing small about him. He was a very companionable person withal, and we frequently chatted about men and measures. It was in these pleasant conversations that I gathered many facts and incidents of his career that explained the secret of his success. It was poverty, pluck, and principle that developed him into such a splendid specimen of a self-made American sovereign. His parents were poor, and as they had eleven children they could not do much for him, so he had to do for himself, which was rather a blessing than a misfortune, because poverty gives a strong boy his best training by inuring him to hardships and self-denial, as well as by whipping and spurring him to do his best on all occasions, while wealth tempts to indulgence, idleness, and dissipation.

It is for this reason that where one young man of fortune makes his mark in the world a hundred poor ones do it.

Young ELLWOOD, while a mere boy, comprehending that he had to push his own way through the world, struck out from his native State, New York, for the mighty West in search of opportunity, which he found in the grand Commonwealth of Illinois, where he did not wait, as do so many young men of the Micawber stripe, for something to turn up, but he diligently set to work to make it turn up by doing the first honest job he could find. No matter whether it was following the plow, driving an ox-cart, splitting rails, molding brick, or rolling dirt in a wheelbarrow, he was ever ready to make his luck. After having thus toiled five or six years and accumulated the necessary funds, feeling the want of a better education, he returned to the Empire State to seek knowledge as earnestly as he had pursued the means to pay for it.

Upon the completion of his studies he was so well equipped with good habits, good principles, and high intelligence that he could not fail to win in the battle of life, especially as he soon after acquired a strong ally in a noble wife, and as he was also zealous, candid, and public-spirited, as well as of a magnetic temperament, no one ought to be surprised at his splendid success in business as well as in politics, both in his native and adopted State.

In politics he was an uncompromising Republican, but not so much in a factional or partisan sense as in being an unyielding champion of equal rights, privileges, and burdens for the whole human race. I heard him remark more than once that from his very boyhood he had been bitterly opposed to African slavery, for the establishment of which in this country primarily the North was as much to blame as the South; but now that the hated institution had been abolished by war, he was for healing the wounds of civil strife and reuniting the sections in fraternal relations; said that he acted with the Republican party from habit, because he had belonged to it all his life on account of its general principles and policy, but that he did not approve of several of its extreme measures and tenets.

It was these liberal sentiments, together with his sociality, heartiness, and fidelity to his Congressional duties, as well as an unmistakable liking for myself that irresistibly drew me toward him, and caused me to watch with peculiar solicitude the rapid inroads that the fell disease which finally carried him off was perceptibly making upon his powerful constitution. On one occasion, near the close of the last Congress, when he had just arisen from an excruciating attack of his incurable malady, he spoke feelingly, yet calmly, of his approaching end. I tried to encourage hope, for which he thanked me, but, sadly shaking his head, said it was no use, as his judgment told him he could not last long, although he might recover from two or three more paroxysms. He alluded touchingly to his happy home and other endearments that made him crave to live, but said fate was against him. Still, conscious of the rectitude of his purposes and actions in the past, and believing that if one's life is right his end can not be wrong, his brave, patient resignation seemed to say:

A man can die but once—we owe God a death.

As he has left his children an honored name to preserve, and left them, as well as his countrymen, a model example to imitate, he has not lived in vain.

Let us all strive to do likewise.

Mr. HITT. Last winter I sat through months of labor here near REUBEN ELLWOOD, that broad-shouldered, strong-voiced, marked man who has been taken away. We represented adjoining districts and similar interests, and entertained kindred views on almost every question discussed in this body. We consulted together almost daily about the interests of our constituents and on all the topics that would arise in two years of daily intercourse. Sometimes he talked of his past life, friendships, struggles, and personal history, for he was one of those positive characters whose strong individuality had marked his career all through life with instructive interest; and he was a delightful companion.

I speak of him to-day with the sensibility of a friend, with the sorrow of one who has lost a friend, with that appreciation of his character and life which comes from having seen a part of his life and having talked often with him of his past. His was a nature made for action, trained from the beginning to strong endeavor. He was one of those to whom hearty exertion was healthy, joyous existence—and his life was all continuous, active, well-earned achievement.

He grew up in Montgomery County, New York, where he was born in 1821. He was a robust boy, stout, large, and active, one of a numerous family. There was no luxury in that household. There was not much opportunity for education. Like almost every stout boy, he found it hard to learn when he did go to school, and it made him impatient. He felt his strength, and that if he could not succeed in his classes he could do something else, and do it well. Still he persevered at school, and finally began to pass all the others. With the opening of his mind came restlessness and longing for action, a brave readiness to begin at once the struggle of life, even in the hardest fashion.

He determined to go out to the new world of the prairies. When only sixteen years old this big boy left New York, made his way resolutely to what was then the far West—and remember this was before the time of railroads. It was in 1837 he came to the rich region, then all wild, of Northeastern Illinois, and began a home in the wilderness, taking his 160 acres of Government land in what is now De Kalb County—that De Kalb County to-day so crowded, so prosperous, so highly cultivated and populous, which he represented in this Hall. There he remained, a laborious, faithful, hopeful youth, for four years, working on his own land and for the farmers of the neighborhood; and then he went back to New York. He wanted more thorough education, and he went to Cherry Valley Academy, a school of excellent repute, where he studied with a stubborn diligence that was rewarded. Every step in this late-gained education was appreciated intensely by him and was a conscious joy. It was to this school that he owed much of the facility he always had in clear, forcible expression, for, though Mr. ELLWOOD never belonged to any of the talking professions, he was an able speaker.

But business was from the first most attractive to his energetic, practical character. He has told me, with quaint humor and lively interest, how he went into the lumber trade; how he raised and manufactured broom-corn at Glenville. He was an active citizen of this town of Glenville for, I think, about eight years, taking a lively interest not only in business and neighborhood questions, but in public affairs. Young as he was, he was chosen one of the supervisors of the county. He had strong convictions in politics then, as many of you personally know he had when he stood with us. At that time he was an ardent Whig. His energy of character brought him into public notice, and he was chosen a member of the assembly of New York in 1850.

A few years later, at the organization of the Republican party, he was one of the first to enlist in the new cause; was an earnest, influential advocate of its ideas, and was sent as a delegate to the national Republican convention which met at Philadelphia in 1856 and nominated John C. Frémont.

But his heart all the while longed for the land of the prairies; and the next year, 1857, he returned to Illinois and fixed his home at Sycamore, in that same De Kalb County he had selected twenty years before. He went into the hardware business, operated a good deal in real estate, and was engaged in business of almost every kind, as opportunity offered to his active, sagacious spirit. He was still earnestly interested in politics, and in 1866, in recognition of his prominence as a Republican and his character as a thorough and high-minded business man, he was appointed assessor of internal revenue, which was then an important office. In 1868 the Republicans of De Kalb County selected him as their candidate for the nomination for Congress, and the De Kalb delegation all voted for him.

He had been dealing in hardware, and Mr. ELLWOOD used to tell, in his original and striking manner, how in handling agricultural implements, which he sold in his hardware business, he was led to study their methods of construction, their principles, and the improvements that suggested themselves to his quick, inventive mind. He saw, too, as a business man of comprehensive grasp, what an immense market the farming West offered to agricultural implements, and thus he was led into invention and manufacturing. As early as 1870 he began, and he brought to his new and higher business such judgment, such economy of means to ends, shrewd good sense and pushing energy that he was successful from the first, and his success broadened each year as he went on. In five years more he began the construction of those extensive shops where the Reuben Ellwood Company has since carried on the manufacture of agricultural implements, pouring out a great stream of the varied machines which are now well known to thousands of our farmers. He was just the man to direct such an enterprise; a good judge of men, vigilant in details, an untiring worker himself, with a big brain, strong body, and hopeful spirit—a natural leader.

With all this load of business he never slackened in his interest in public affairs. He worked for the cause he believed in and the principles he loved. He bore his full share of every burden and performed his part in the active support of his party and its cause.

In 1882 the Republicans chose him as their candidate for Congress from the fifth district of Illinois. Of course he was elected, for there is no uncertainty about the voice of De Kalb, Boone, and the neighboring counties. His majority was very handsome—7,800—increased by the high esteem in which he was personally held. It was during that Forty-eighth Congress, beginning in December, 1883, and ending last spring, that so many gentlemen who sit around me saw and knew REUBEN ELLWOOD—for nearly two hundred of you were members of that Congress. I know you will all bear witness to the fidelity, diligence, and intelligence with which he discharged his duties as a representative of the people. He brought here the ways of a business man—prompt, watchful, keenly measuring the practical value and bearing of every measure. He was a good worker in committee, where, as we know, the greater part of the work of Congress is done, never occupying time with needless words, having an opinion of his own, and a sound, sensible reason for it. He was a thorough Republican, of long-tried, well-considered convictions, believing that his party deserved his support, not because of any bigotry or slavishness, but because popular governments are always to be governed by great parties if they are to exist at all, and that it is the duty of the citizen, having chosen what he believes to be the truth in principle and the best in party, to stand firmly by his party and his faith.

He was a regular attendant at the sessions of the House. Even the long night sessions, that always come toward the close of a Congress, did not tire him out, for though he was growing into age, almost sixty-four years old, he was the picture of manly vigor, a solid man, ripened and turning gray, stout but not yet heavy in movement, the light of his eye undiminished. He moved with a strong step, and when he spoke it was briefly, in a quick powerful voice and right to the point, for his ideas were as clear and decided as his tone or his tread.

The routine proceedings of the House, and still more the long debates, wearied him, and close attendance on the House was a harder duty for him than others—more irksome to his nature and activity. He grew tired of talk and delay, discussions on points of order, and the eternally recurring objections that seemed to prevent anything at all from being accomplished. He wanted to act, to dispatch public business as he did his own—examine the matter carefully and thoroughly, and then decide it. He said, time is worth something to somebody else if it is not to those who are taking up so much time. To have to sit and listen to a prolonged debate of many days on an old subject like the tariff, while he thought of all his own important interests requiring his attention a thousand miles away, made him impatient.

He was disgusted and annoyed with post-office strifes and the small-beer statesmanship of getting and settling petty appointments. But he really loved the essential duties of a legislator. He seized the scope of a bill quickly and clearly. If it was a new subject to him he went to work upon it with all his strength, and he was so strong that he soon mastered it. He took delight in the fruitful work of legislation, in any saving of public money, in studying how to cure a burdensome or faulty law, or prevent an injustice, or carry out a great line of public policy. Although he served but one term in Congress, he had already become a practical and efficient legislator, of broad, liberal, progressive views.

In his business he was the same. His mode of adding to his own wealth was beneficent to others. There was nothing ignoble or sordid in it. Each machine for planting or cultivating that he made and sold multiplied the hands and lengthened and strengthened the arms of the farmer who used it. It added to the hours of the day by adding to the work which could be accomplished in it. In wisely combining simple instruments into new machines, in subduing and applying the rude forces of nature, he conferred fresh strength upon all his neighbors to perform useful labor, created new comfort, and increased the general happiness.

He was without inherited wealth, and fought his way sturdily and steadily to competence, to position, to independence, and in doing this his productive activity shed blessings upon others at every step. His nature was self-reliant and commanding. He was himself a fine piece of human machinery, driven by a brave strong spirit, that ground every obstacle down before its steadfast power. From the beginning, as a boy, to the end of his honorable life he earned and paid his scot.

If he did not inherit wealth, he was heir to marked family qualities. The seven Elwood brothers are a tribe in Israel, a valiant element in De Kalb County, a body of prominent families, workers, and leaders, honorable and honored for worth and for success.

There are many hundreds of people living in the district I represent who knew the face and voice of REUBEN ELLWOOD, and shared the great sorrow that pervaded the more eastern counties, where he was universally known, when the news spread through tbe country that this noble-hearted man was dead. And there are many of the members of this House who felt a pang of grief that one whom we had known and respected and learned to know was worthy of all honor had suddenly been called from the labors and joys and honors of earth to the life beyond the grave, and that we should see him no more in his accustomed seat.

He has left us the valuable lesson of his career—the example of a pure private life, absolute integrity in business, fidelity and efficiency as a Representative, and the devotion to principle in all public affairs which is found in one who loves and serves his country as a true patriot.

Mr. PETERS. In December, 1883, at the first meeting of the Forty-eighth Congress, my acquaintance with Hon. REUBEN ELLWOOD began. After the drawing for seats we became neighbors. Day by day our acquaintance grew until it ripened into friendship. Though many years my senior, his cordial and genial manner attracted me to him, and ere the session aged I enjoyed his confidence.

This was an honor and a compliment which I then cherished and now fondly recall. I esteem it a pleasurable duty to speak for and of him to-day.

Time had wrinkled his face, but not his heart. Filled as this was with human sunshine, his daily greeting had a glow and warmth of well-wishing that was infectious. Sixty-four years of life had not mildewed his disposition. His very presence dispelled gloomy thought and scattered troublous apprehension. His large expressive eyes were the windows through which the soul within shone with such fervor, that the plain face was made to appear handsome.

He was frank and outspoken, sometimes even to abruptness, but so earnest, kind, and sincere that he seldom gave offense. His conscience was his own tribunal, and its decrees the rule and guide to his action.

He was nearly always in his seat during the sessions of the House, giving personal attention as well as consideration to legislative proceedings.

His strong intellect and large practical experience gave a force to his suggestions that impressed instantly. He was not an orator, but rather a strong thinker and a logical reasoner. He did not speak often in the House, but when he did speak he sought to inform and convince his hearers. He spoke to those who were present, and always commanded attention. He was an industrious member, very methodical in his work, and each day's closing brought rich returns to the people of his district, in much of which the general public shared.

His political convictions, like all others entertained by him, were very strong. He believed certain political tenets were right, and, being honest in this belief, was a partisan. He was an honest politician, controlled by conviction and not by policy. The "mugwumpian" land, was to him neutral ground, upon which no honest man could stand and preserve his self-respect. He accorded to every man the right to differ with him, but his opponent, to secure his respect, must differ from principle. With him there was no intermediate play-ground between truth and error. The fawning changeling for place received and merited his supreme contempt.

He was very strong in his affections. One day in the House a telegram was handed him. He opened it somewhat eagerly, because he had many anxieties about business affairs at home. After reading he handed it to me, and as I took it I noticed the large, expressive eyes fill with tears, the lips quiver, and the involuntary sob well up from the anguished heart. The message announced the death of his favorite grandchild. The richest, strongest evidence of sincere affection was the glistening tear in the eye of this great strong man. No greater tribute of love could be given even by the angelic host.

"Few men get their life-labor accomplished without some sore heartaches." This affliction was a severe one, from which he never fully rallied. We parted at close of the session expecting to meet here again. One day in mid-summer, while scanning the dispatches in the daily papers in my far Western home, I read of his serious illness; the next day brought news of his death. The grandfather and grandchild had reunited in a fairer clime, where affection's current is never broken.

Personally, I know nothing about his home or the people he so well represented in the Forty-eighth Congress, but I believe home and people in his death lost an able, fearless, and upright champion.

The frequency of death's visits almost familiarizes us with "the pale horse and rider." Like the broad river sweeping on, unmindful of the drops of water that are separated from it by the sun's heat or the dashing spray, so the current of life's busy stream sweeps on, scarce noticing the drops that are separated from it by the summons of the "Grim Messenger." There are bitter tears, sorrowing hearts, a new-made grave, but the busy hum of the world does not cease for an instant. When some one can step aside from this busy throng and say truthfully of him who has been summoned, "He was a man," it is a eulogy fit for the king of men. From my short but intimate acquaintance with REUBEN ELLWOOD I feel that I can earnestly, fervently, and truthfully say of him, "He was a man." His life was a busy one. He went from New York to Illinois when that prairie State was yet the far West. He—

> Crossed the prairies, as of old
> Our fathers crossed the sea,
> To make the West, as they the East,
> The homestead of the free.

The early history of the West is the prophecy; the later history is the fulfillment. The one is hope, the other is fruition. The inspiration is of the East—Eastern. The accomplishment is of the West—Western.

The school and the home in New York, cleared and planted and tilled the youth and early manhood, but Illinois, with her enlarged possibilities, ripened and garnered the harvest. After "life's fitful fever" his remains rest in the honored soil of his adopted State. Her people will guard his memory, and her sons in this House and elsewhere accord to his character and life merit and praise more appropriate than mine. Be it for me to say that I am the better and stronger for having known him and that the world is better for his having lived in it.

His work is done. He now fully realizes—

> After the shower the tranquil sun;
> After the snow, the emerald leaves;
> Silver stars after the day is done;
> After the harvest, golden sheaves.
> After the clouds, the violet sky;
> After the tempest, the hill of waves;
> Quiet woods, when the winds go by;
> After the battle, peaceful graves.
> After the burden, the blissful mead;
> After the flight, the downy nest;
> After the furrow, the waking seed;
> After the shadowy river, rest.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it is true that no word we utter here can benefit him whose loss we meet to mourn; but good, and good only, can result from recounting the virtues of those who lose life in their country's service.

It was not my fortune to meet REUBEN ELLWOOD till the early part of the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress. Those who have had experience here I think will agree with me that the House of Representatives does not afford the best opportunities for thorough acquaintance with members in a short time. The duties are so great and so incessant, that in the rush of the session and the hurry of business we have to get acquainted as we can, not as we would.

But my acquaintance with the deceased was very intimate and exceedingly pleasant. It began by both being placed on the same committee. I remember the day it began with great pleasure; the day death ended it with much pain. Our first interview I remember distinctly. He had been detained at home some days after the announcement of committees of the House, so he could not attend the first meeting of the committee. On his return he came to my seat in the House, introduced himself to me, saying he observed I was chairman of his committee, explained the cause of his absence, and avowed his purpose to miss no meetings. How well he kept that resolution the records of the Claims Committee bear most honorable testimony. He had referred to him more than fifty bills, and hence I know whereof I speak when I say he was ever vigilant and efficient.

In the discharge of duty he knew no fagging, no friend, no foe. In its discharge he was not moved by passion nor swayed by prejudice. He had strong political convictions, but never allowed them to control him in the committee-room. Indeed, after two years of intimate association, where we met almost daily, I do not remember a single action in committee by which any opinion could be formed of his political faith. I have said he had strong political convictions. Yes; he believed that no greater calamity could overtake our people than for them to become too ignorant to have opinions concerning their government or too cowardly to avow them. But it is also true that he had a heart big enough to love every lover of his country, and had patriotism enough to condemn every man who was an enemy to his country's institutions.

What an encouragement is his life to the destitute, uneducated youth! Born of poor parents, he was cast upon his own resources at an early age. When, in 1837, he left his New York home, sixteen years old, and took up his line of march for De Kalb County, Illinois, he had nothing but robust health, strong will, untiring industry, and high integrity. But combine these, and the fortunate possessor is sufficiently armed and equipped for the battle of life in our heaven-favored country, and can no more fail under our free institutions than the planet can fail to keep its orbit. From this combination we have derived our Jacksons, our Clays, and our Websters. So marked has been the progress of men struggling against poverty, that it would seem that man, like the kite, rises against the wind, not with it.

Adversity tries the man as heat tries the metal, and only proves the sternness of the stuff of which he is made. From the beginning of his career he had the intelligence to form opinions for himself and the manliness to express them. But while firm in his own convictions, he was deferential to the opinions of others. He demanded no cringing from others nor yielded it to others. After he had battled against adversity for four years, and about the time he attained his majority, he concluded he must have additional educational attainments. So, returning to New York, he entered Cherry Valley Academy, and began the course of study which was of so much service to him in after years. This step was indicative of the spirit that always characterized him.

It is hard enough for us to confess ignorance at all times; but it requires more moral courage than most men have after four years have been spent in the active pursuits of successful business life to go back to the school-room almost entirely unlettered and take a place at the foot of classes composed of those who are years younger than we. This young ELLWOOD had the courage to do, and it was indicative of that spirit which enabled him to overcome the obstacles of life.

When thirty years old he made his first political venture, and was elected a representative to the New York assembly as a Whig.

I will leave to others who knew him earlier the office of giving step by step the different periods of his life. It is sufficient for me to say that, whether we trace REUBEN ELLWOOD through the trials of youth, the struggles of young manhood, the eminent success of mature age, or the last great triumph of his life, when one hundred and sixty-five thousand people called him to serve them in the Congress of the great Republic, he is the same honorable, high-toned man. In every field of labor, in every walk of life, he inquired only where the path of duty lay, and followed it whether it led to his personal loss or gain. In the home circle he had all the gentleness and tenderness necessary to make those around him happy. At the same time he had all the strength and sternness required to meet and move men in the affairs of life.

After a life full of activity and success the day approached when his struggles were to end and his successes cease. The 1st day of July came and found him surrounded by faithful friends and anxious loved ones, but beyond their power to give him relief. He knew his end was nigh, and faced it, as he had life, with firm resignation. His last words were, "It is all right; it is all right." The "golden bowl" of his terrestrial existence was broken and the "silver cord" that bound REUBEN ELLWOOD to this life was "loosed." His family lost its chief stay, society a most worthy member, and his country a patriot. This consolation is left to all, that he belongs to that class of whom it may be truly said:

> Nor wreck, nor change, nor winter's blight,
> Nor death's remorseless doom,
> Shall dim one ray of holy light
> That gilds their glorious tomb.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with REUBEN ELLWOOD commenced a few days before the assembling of the Forty-eighth Congress. Occupying almost adjoining seats, and representing the district nearly bordering upon my own in the State of Illinois, I was often thrown into his company. I would be unwilling to let this occasion pass without offering my tribute to the memory of a man that I learned to like so well. Full of zeal in his work, active in behalf of his constituents, faithful to his duties, he was in my judgment a useful and efficient member of this House. Personally I admired the man. His frequent reference to his family and his home, and his often-expressed wish that the days might rapidly pass so that he could once more join the "loved ones," plainly proved his excellent qualities of head and heart.

Never shall I forget the evidence of great grief displayed when a telegram was handed him, while in the midst of his duties here, announcing the death of his little grandson. While the eyes filled with tears and the great frame shook with emotion, the heart almost broken, and the fact that he was unable to be present at the funeral adding to his sorrow, still, with the resignation of a true Christian, he said to us, "Hard it is; but he is in a happier world than this." The continued and repeated evidences of good-will and affection of the people among whom he lived and whom he represented in the Congress of the United States plainly demonstrated their confidence. We knew him but a few months, yet long enough to heartily indorse all that his home friends and neighbors might say for him.

Greater statesmen may have come upon the stage of life than our friend, men whose names may live longer in history than REUBEN ELLWOOD, yet none have been more faithful in the work given them to do.

The reputation of a man in the immediate locality of his own home is more precious than honors that may be ascribed by the outside world. Our friend in an eminent degree gained and kept the affection of his own fellow-citizens. His work is done; his labors are ended. He lives again. He now enters upon that real life which shall have no end.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, my respect for Mr. ELLWOOD'S character is so profound, my relations with him during the Forty-eighth Congress were so cordial and intimate, that I can not forbear the attempt to add one more tribute to his memory.

His district adjoined mine. We had many interests in common. As the first session of the last Congress went on I came to understand and respect him more and more, not only as I met him here on the floor of the House, but elsewhere. We frequently walked home from the Capitol together at the close of the day's session. On these occasions he would sometimes open his heart to me, and I could see how his simple, strong, home-loving nature was affected by the hurry and excitement of life in Washington. I do not think Mr. ELLWOOD enjoyed Congressional life, save as he enjoyed the consciousness of serving with all his might a constituency for which he entertained a sincere and profound respect.

I remember he told me one afternoon toward the end of the long session that he had no desire to remain in Congress. He felt himself unfitted for the place. As for debate on the floor, he told me that he often had a desire to join it, but had always been held back by a distrust in his ability to hold the attention of the House. As for the routine duties which consume so much of the time and strength and vitality of a member of Congress, his feeble health rendered them peculiarly irksome. Yet he performed them with scrupulous and painstaking regularity to the very utmost of his physical ability. It was his duty, and that was enough.

Notwithstanding his indifference to political distinction, he did earnestly desire to be returned to Congress for a second term. He simply wanted his constituents to say that he had served them well. After that term he would go back to his quiet regular home life, and among the people who had given him repeated testimonials of their confidence and esteem he looked forward to spending in comfort and honor and congenial occupation the declining years of his life.

In supposing that he was unfitted for debate on the floor of the House Mr. ELLWOOD greatly underrated his own powers. My colleague has told us how on one occasion he broke through his habitual reserve, and by a sudden burst of eloquence bore down all opposition and carried a political convention by storm.

We, too, who knew him in the Forty-eighth Congress well remember one occasion, two years ago, when Mr. ELLWOOD, who till then had never addressed the House, felt that the interests of his constituents were at stake and that he must take the floor. He did so, and the House, wearied as it was by a long debate, was at once stilled into respectful silence by his magnificent voice and by the clear, terse English in which his ideas were expressed.

Not the least useful among members surely is he who speaks thoroughly well when he has something definite to say, and is content to be silent on all other occasions.

We have heard from the chairman of his committee how faithful his service was, how decided his convictions, how free his charity for the convictions of others.

There are some men whose toleration of other men's opinions is due to the lack of strong opinions of their own. There are other men whose strong convictions make them purblind even to the honesty of those whose convictions do not accord with their own. In neither class could Mr. ELLWOOD find a place. He was a friend of the people, but he did not claim to be the only friend the people had. Above the reach of suspicion himself, it did not occur to him to suspect the integrity of others merely because they differed with him on some public question. He willingly gave credit even to those whose political theories he condemned for possessing motives as disinterested as his own.

That is the true frame of mind and feeling for an American legislator. We represent a country so vast, so diversified in its material interests, so varied in the habits of life and thought which prevail among its people, that we can not expect to truly express the sentiment of the nation unless we can deliberate together with malice toward none and with charity to all.

Those who can not understand how the policy of a great nation can be wisely and safely guided without the aid of professional statesmen of long experience in public affairs, but solely by the sterling integrity and clear judgment of representative men who express here in the National Legislature the virtue and intelligence and public spirit of their Congressional districts, may learn something from the brief, laborious, conscientious public career of REUBEN ELLWOOD.

The resolutions were adopted; and accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr INGALLS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1020) authorizing the District of Columbia to convey the alley, 15 feet wide, running east and west, between lots 6 and 7, in square 635, comprising an area of 3,480 square feet of land, to the owner of said lots, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom a letter was addressed by the Secretary of State under date of January 8, 1886, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War addressed to the Secretary of State under date of December 29, 1885, and a copy of a letter addressed to the Secretary of State by General O. O. Howard, United States Army, under date of 16th November, 1885, requesting the consent of Congress to General Howard receiving from the French Republic a decoration of the Legion of Honor and the brevet appointment and honorary rank of chevalier, submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

GEORGE S. STORRS.

Mr. INGALLS. I report from the Committee on the Judiciary favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 831) for the relief of George S. Storrs, of Texas.

In accordance with the practice of the Senate, which has grown almost into the force of law, I ask that the bill may be now considered, it being one to remove the political disabilities of the person named in the bill. I will state that he was a midshipman in the United States Navy who resigned in 1860. A petition in due form is presented and is accompanied by a certificate from the proper officers that he was not indebted to the Government of the United States at the time of his resignation. I ask that the bill may be read and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. I ask whether the bill is based upon a petition?

Mr. INGALLS. A petition, I stated, was filed, together with a certificate of non-indebtedness on the part of the proper accounting officers of the United States.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was, in line 4, after the word "Texas," to insert "be, and he;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That George S. Storrs, of the State of Texas, be, and he is hereby, relieved of all political disabilities imposed upon him by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in favor thereof.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MAXEY introduced a bill (S. 1284) to enable the Secretary of War to examine the claims of the States of Texas, Colorado, Oregon, California, Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, as directed by the act approved June 27, 1882, chapter 241 of the laws of the Forty-seventh Congress, first session; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MAXEY. Accompanying the bill is a very important letter from the Secretary of War, which should be considered in connection with the bill. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of War accompanying the bill be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks that the letter accompanying the bill introduced by him be printed as a document. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. MAXEY. I now move that the bill, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMPTON introduced a bill (S. 1285) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1286) to amend section 604 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1287) granting a pension to William L. Clarke; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1292) granting a pension to N. Z. Bailey; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1294) providing for the auditing and payment of claims of soldiers who served in the several Indian wars in Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 1295) to regulate appointments and promotions in the staff of the Marine Corps; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CALL. By request of the governor of the State of Florida I introduce a bill.

The bill (S. 1293) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and pay the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

I ask the indulgence of the Senate to say a word in explanation of the bill. This subject, in the shape of a bill, was introduced by my colleague [Mr. JONES] in the Forty-eighth Congress, and after consideration by the Committee on Military Affairs a bill was reported allowing the State of Florida $92,000 in money and canceling the bonds of the State held by the Indian trust fund. While that bill was pending before the Senate, after a favorable report by the Committee on Military Affairs, a letter was received from the then governor of Florida asking my colleague, with whom the entire correspondence by the State authorities had been had, to object to the passage of the bill and ask its recommitment to the Committee on Military Affairs. The letter, which was addressed by the governor of the State, Governor Bloxham, to my colleague, was as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, Tallahassee, Fla., April 11, 1884.

DEAR JONES: Your favor of the 7th has been received and considered. After advising with many members of our State government I sent the telegram about the Indian claim. Now, my dear Senator, I will give you our reasons, according to the settlement proposed in the Hampton report. The State would receive the difference between the $224,000 allowed by the Secretary of War and the $132,000 of our bonds held by the Indian trust fund, or $92,000 in cash and our one hundred and thirty-two bonds.

Governor Drew made a contract with Mr. Wailes to allow him 15 per cent. I supposed, when we assented at last Congress, that it was 15 per cent. upon the money we received. But Mr. Wailes claims the 15 per cent. on the money, and on the $132,000 bonds and on the interest due on those bonds or the coupons representing said interest. When in Jacksonville last February Mr. Wailes and myself called on Governor Drew and he interpreted the contract as Mr. Wailes did. Now, take $132,000 in bonds, interest on same $240,000, and $92,000 in cash, making $464,000, upon which Mr. Wailes would claim 15 per cent. interest, you see at once, after deducting his commission from the cash we receive, there would be but an insignificant sum to turn into the treasury. It would be too small to be satisfactory. I think it had better go over than, practically, for all we receive in cash to go in the shape of commissions.

Believe me, your friend, truly,

W. D. BLOXHAM.

Hon. C. W. JONES,
United States Senate.

In introducing this bill I desire to say that I at previous sessions of Congress had received numerous communications from the people of the State stating that a portion of these claims for services rendered by soldiers in the Indian wars in Florida and for the compensation due them for equipments lost in the service of the United States had never been paid, and that the surviving widows and children of those soldiers had a right to be paid, and requesting, as their claims had been sent to me, that I would ask the passage of a bill for their payment. To the end therefore that, instead of paying a claim agent about $62,000, nearly the whole of the $92,000 proposed to be paid in money by the General Government for the debt which the State had assumed in defending her soil from the Indians, I propose that a condition should be attached to it that the money should be first applied to the payment of the surviving soldiers who had not been paid and to their widows and children in preference to this payment of 15 per cent. upon an enormous claim to an alleged State agent, who was not known and who had rendered no service, and who could not possibly render any service or contribute in any way to the passage of the bill.

The present governor of the State has informed me in a recent conversation that he would regard such a condition as a reflection on the State. I regard it as a reflection upon the Senate of the United States, upon the Senators and Members of Congress, and a great injury to the State that the large amount of 15 per cent. on $464,000 should be paid for services never rendered, while the soldiers who rendered the services for which the State government is paid remain in part unpaid and their widows and children suffering and unprovided for. Under these circumstances I consider it a public scandal that a vast sum of money should be paid to lawyers or pretended agents for votes to be given in Congress by Senators and Representatives upon subjects clearly ascertained, upon which the history of the legislation of the country has been fixed for years, as it has been on this subject of reimbursing the States for expenses incurred in suppressing Indian hostilities, where there is no possibility to render any service. The idea of $62,000 being paid out of the sum of $92,000 allowed by Congress I think should receive public condemnation, and I desire in my place in the Senate to give expression to this opinion that it may reach the people of the State. I have no doubt as to what the people of the State desire. They desire this money to be paid first to the honest and just claims of soldiers, their widows and children, who have rendered service and have not been paid, and then to be appropriated to the education of the children of the State, and not to the payment of individuals for services not rendered. There are no services that can by any possibility be rendered.

It is a plain question of legislation, upon which the history of the country has committed the Government and upon which there has never been a failure on the part of Congress to pay since the early history of the country. I have been informed that the Legislature of the State has directed that this money when paid shall be first applied to the payment of the soldiers who have not been paid.

There was a question, however, which I hope the committee will consider and act on favorably and without delay. No interest was allowed the State of Florida upon her claim for money expended in suppressing these hostilities. It will make a considerable difference in the amount, and it is in my opinion clear that this interest should be allowed by the committee, and a bill for the payment of the whole amount passed by the Senate. I desire that the subject shall again be investigated by the Committee on Military Affairs, and that the interest may be allowed the State upon this claim; and for this purpose this bill has been introduced.

The present governor informs me, unofficially, that he is not of the opinion, as far as he as an individual is concerned, that this alleged contract with his predecessor, Governor Drew, for the payment of this enormous sum, was a proper contract; but that officially he can express no opinion on the subject. I desire that the matter shall receive investigation by the committee, and that such a direction shall be given, so far as it is proper and consistent with the rights of the State, to this money when it is paid to the State of Florida as will secure its appropriation in conformity with the act of the Legislature of Florida, and will relieve the State officers and the State from all trouble from the alleged contract, and apply it to the payment, first, of those who rendered these services, and then the State will be at liberty to devote the rest of the money to education or to give it away, if she pleases, under the alleged contract, to agents for services never rendered, but claimed to have been rendered, here.

Mr. President, the governor of Florida and the courts of Florida and all her authorities are doubtless entirely faithful and earnest in the performance of their duties to the people and quite as solicitous as I am for everything that concerns the welfare of the State and her people—and the interests of her people can be safely left to them—in respect to this and all other State interests; but I think a duty is presented by this case for the Senate and Congress to vindicate themselves by some public expression in regard to such a transaction. So far as I am concerned I urge upon the committee and the Senate immediate and favorable consideration of this bill and the payment of this claim, both principal and interest, and the release of the money due the State now in the Treasury Department and withheld from her because of the bond debt and other unsettled claims of the United States. The State needs this money for the education of her children and for other necessary public purposes. I shall spare neither time nor effort to accomplish this purpose, and if any considerable part of this money shall fail to be applied to these objects, but shall be donated to individuals under fictitious pretenses, the fault and the responsibility shall not rest on me.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to have read at the desk and printed some amendments proposed to the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks consent to present amendments to the bill referred to at this time? Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. I want them read, so as to go into the RECORD, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the proposed amendments will be read and ordered to be printed.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendments, as follows:

Section 4, line 57, after "counted," insert "which appear to have been cast by the electors whose names appear on the lists certified by the executive of the State in accordance with the provisions of section 136 of the Revised Statutes as hereby amended, or in case of a vacancy in the board of electors so certified, then by the persons appointed to fill such vacancy in the mode provided by the laws of the State, or, if there be no such list, or if there be more than one such list purporting to be so certified, then those votes and those only shall be counted which."

Add to the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. "Section 136 of the Revised Statutes is amended to read as follows: 'SEC. 136. It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified under the great seal of the State, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet.'"

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill; which was ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF NICARAGUA CANAL ROUTE.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

CONSIDERATION OF EXECUTIVE NOMINATIONS.

Mr. PLATT. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That executive nominations shall hereafter be considered in open session, except when otherwise ordered by vote of the Senate.

Mr. President, I have offered the resolution for reference to the Committee on Rules, and I ask that it may be printed also. I do not desire to speak upon it at the present time, except merely to call the attention of the Committee on Rules to it and to express the hope that it may receive early consideration and an early report. If the report should be favorable, I do not think I shall have anything to say on the resolution, but if otherwise, I shall then desire to submit some remarks on the subject of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules and be printed.

SILVER DEPOSITS AT NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. EUSTIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 71) authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia to supply plants and shrubs to fill certain vases in the Pension building; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

STATUES OF LAFAYETTE AND GARFIELD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of War, which was read:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 29, 1886.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I notice in the RECORD that a concurrent resolution will probably be acted on to-day taking the circle at the intersection of Maryland avenue and First street west for the statue of Lafayette. I send you the proceedings of the commission showing the selection of that site, under law, for the statue of President Garfield; also, a contract made with J. Q. A. Ward to erect a pedestal at that spot. Thinking these facts may have escaped your memory, I have forwarded the above papers, which, being originals, please have them kept in safe custody until returned to this Department.

Very truly, yours,

WM. C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

Mr. VEST. I ask that the communication lie on the table until the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has consulted with the Senator from Vermont in regard to the communication. It will lie on the table for the present. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. MORRILL subsequently said: I move that the letter from the Secretary of War relative to a site for the statues of Lafayette and Garfield, laid on the table by the President pro tempore, be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

SIOUX RESERVATION IN DAKOTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions," the consideration of the Calendar is in order. The first case on the Calendar will be reported.

The bill (S. 52) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians, in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1 of the proposed amendment, after the word "claims," in line 14, it is proposed to insert:

And procure title thereto under the provisions of section 20 of this act.

And in line 15, after the word "required," to strike out "by law" and insert "therein;" so as to read:

Shall, for a period of ninety days after the proclamation of the President required to be made by section 22 of this act, have a right to re-enter upon said claims and procure title thereto under the provisions of section 20 of this act, and complete the same as required therein.

Mr. HARRISON. I simply wish to repeat what I have once before said, that it seems to me section 20 of the bill, to which the amendment refers distinctly, limits entries to homesteads, and I can not help but think that to make the amendment read that those who located homestead, pre-emption, or town-site claims shall complete those claims under the homestead laws, is, I will not say an absurdity, because the Senator from Kansas would not propose an absurdity, but there is an incongruity and contradiction of terms about it that, it seems to me, will embarrass the Land Department in dealing with this question. I do not know how a pre-emption entry can be settled under the homestead law; and that is what the bill will require if the amendment be adopted.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Indiana is entirely mistaken. We are not dealing with pre-emption entries at all, and no reference is made to them in the bill so far except for the purpose of identifying both the person and the land. Having said that whoever had entered under any of these laws might enter that land under the homestead law we have done all that is needed, so far as making our intent perfectly certain and plain is concerned. There will be no difficulty in applying the rule provided for in my amendment for the person taking the homestead claim if that homestead claim was the same land upon which he had before settled, whether he had settled under the homestead law or under the pre-emption law. In either case he would go on and perfect his title under section 20. Therefore there is not only no trouble about it, but the matter is, as I said, perfectly clear.

Mr. HARRISON. As I said to the Senator from Kansas, if a man has taken one homestead claim he can not take another.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, but under section 20 he can, if he has taken half a dozen, take another.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not so understand it.

Mr. PLUMB. Section 20 does not limit the right to exercise the privilege allowed in that section to persons who have not heretofore availed themselves of the provisions of the homestead law, but it is applicable to all citizens of the United States who may go upon this land and take it under the provisions of that section.

Mr. HARRISON. There is exactly the point of difference between myself and the Senator from Kansas. I ask the attention of Senators to the first clause of section 20. It reads:

That all the lands acquired by the provisions of this act, except American Island, Farm Island, and Niobrara Island, shall be disposed of by the United States to actual settlers only, under the provisions of the homestead laws of the United States.

I undertake to say that that makes all the provisions of the homestead law applicable to the case of these settlers, and if it does, then it makes applicable that provision of the homestead law which says that no person shall make more than one homestead entry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask for a division on that.

Mr. MANDERSON and Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1 of the proposed amendment, line 14, after the word "claims," it is proposed to insert the words "and procure title thereto under the provisions of section 20 of this act;" and in line 15 to strike out the words "by law" and insert "therein;" so as to read:

Shall, for a period of ninety days after the proclamation of the President required to be made by section 22 of this act, have a right to re-enter upon said claims and procure title thereto under the provisions of section 20 of this act and complete the same as required therein, and their said claims shall for such time have a preference over later entries.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me to say that if the construction which the Senator from Indiana puts upon this clause is correct, its application here would only be to that few, scarcely appreciable number, who have acquired a homestead elsewhere and who now seek to acquire another homestead. It would not be a very great hardship to such a man if he was excluded from acquiring a second homestead upon this land if he had acquired one elsewhere.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Massachusetts misses the whole point. Under the bill as it stands no man can acquire a second homestead. The question here is whether pre-emptors who were invited by the proclamation of the President to make claims under the land laws of the United States, and who had previously taken a homestead entry in Iowa or Nebraska, or somewhere else than on this reservation, made a pre-emption entry——

Mr. DAWES. That is just what I say. A man who acquired a homestead elsewhere has come here and availed himself of another provision of law to get another homestead by pre-emption. He would be excluded, if the Senator's construction is right, from obtaining a second homestead through the provisions of the homestead law. I do not think it can be possible to find any such man there; but if it is possible, the hardship to him is that he does not have the advantage over all the rest of having obtained under the general laws of the United States two homesteads for nothing. The bounty of the United States to the extent of a single homestead is a wise, generous, and useful one, but he avails himself of this circumlocution to get two. I do not think it is a hardship, that it is worth while for us to destroy the uniformity of this whole settlement to make provision for; and that is why I vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] as amended.

Mr. PLUMB. I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that in order to make the amendment harmonious the words "pre-emption and," in line 21 of the first section, should be stricken out. I suggest that we also strike out the word "money," in line 20, and insert the words "price to be;" so as to read:

The price to be paid for town-site entries shall be such as is required by law in other cases.

The price for homestead entries is fixed by section 20. That would leave the price for town-site entries to be one dollar and a quarter an acre.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to that. It conforms.

Mr. PLUMB. I move, in line 20, to strike out the word "money" and insert "price to be," and to strike out the words "pre-emption and," in line 21.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the first section of the proposed amendment, line 20, it is proposed to strike out the word "money" and insert the words "price to be;" and in line 21 to strike out the words "pre-emption and;" so as to read:

The price to be paid for town-site entries shall be such as are required by law in other cases, and shall be paid into the general fund provided for by this act.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A verbal amendment is suggested by the Secretary, but it does not change the meaning. The word "are" will be changed to "is" before "required" in line 21. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In section 13 there was an amendment agreed to, beginning in line 5 and running to line 8. I think the amendment should be transposed, so that the clause shall read:

May, at his option, within one year from the time when this act shall take effect, by recording his election with the proper agent at the agency to which he belongs, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment, being verbal, will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to section 22 as it is here. The number will be changed to correspond, as the two sections proposed by me come in before it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The numbering of the subsequent sections will be arranged by the Secretary without a formal motion.

Mr. HARRISON. But that was only preliminary to what I am about to say.

Section 22 reads:

That this act shall take effect only upon the acceptance thereof and consent thereto by the different bands of the Sioux Nation of Indians.

That limitation ought not to apply to the two sections which formed my amendment. The limitation that the act shall take effect only upon the acceptance thereof by the Indians ought not to apply to those two sections, because the assessment of the losses suffered by the people referred to in these two sections ought to go on, whether the Indians agree or not.

Mr. DAWES. I think that is right. The suggestion of the Senator, if he has an amendment to meet that idea, would be just.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana propose an amendment to the two sections indicated?

Mr. DAWES. Is the Senator from Indiana certain that his amendment would not fix upon this land that is proposed to be opened these homesteaders without the act taking effect otherwise; so that if this fails to take effect it would be better for us in a separate bill to make such proper indemnity to these men than it would to attempt to make it any part of this bill to take effect without the whole of it.

Mr. HARRISON. It seems to me there can be no objection to excepting from this limitation the second section of the amendment I proposed, which requires the President to appoint a special agent.

Mr. DAWES. I think that might be done, but the first of the two sections it would not be safe to except.

Mr. HARRISON. The second section of the amendment I offered provides for the appointment of an agent who shall inquire into these losses. He is first to make his inquiry as to those who settled upon that part of the reservation which by the bill is still retained and established as an Indian reservation; and then the last clause provides that in case the consent of the Indians is not obtained he shall extend that inquiry to the other land.

Mr. DAWES. That is right.

Mr. HARRISON. So that I think it might be said in the second section of the amendment that "this act, except as to section—what would be the number of it?

Mr. DAWES. It would be section number 23, would it not?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know how that is.

Mr. DAWES. There are two sections introduced between sections 21 and 22. I suggest that the beginning of what is now section 24 be made to read: "That this act, except section 23, shall take effect," &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 22——

Mr. DAWES. Strike out "22" and make it section 24.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 24 [22] in line 1, after the word "act," it is proposed to insert the words "except as to section 23;" so as to read:

That this act, except as to section 23, shall take effect only upon the acceptance thereof and consent thereto by the different bands of the Sioux Nation of Indians, &c.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that probably makes it right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that amendment will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to propose another amendment, which is necessary to make the bill consistent. In line 4 of section 20, after the word "homestead," I move to insert the words "and town site."

Mr. DAWES. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that amendment will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. In line 9 of the same section I move to insert, after the word "payments," the words "the last of said payments to be made at the expiration of five years from said entry."

My object is to make this homestead settlement cover a period of five years, in accordance with the provisions of the general homestead law, and to make these four annual payments, if the money is to be paid in that way, come within the last four years. Every one who knows anything about the burdens that fall upon the people who enter upon land on the extreme frontier knows that the trial and tribulation all occur in the first two or three years; that during that period it is almost impossible for a settler to make a living upon his land.

Mr. DAWES. You propose also to strike out "four," in line 10?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes; I propose to follow that up by striking out in line 9 the word "four" and inserting the word "five," so as to entitle the homestead settler to a patent only at the expiration of five years. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests that I read it as it will be, so that there will be no misunderstanding about it:

Provided, That each settler, under and in accordance with the provisions of said homestead acts, shall pay to the United States for the land so taken by him, in addition to the fees provided by law, the sum of 50 cents for each and every acre, in four equal annual payments, the last of said payments to be made at the expiration of five years from said entry, and shall be entitled to a patent therefor only at the expiration of five years from the date of entry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 20, line 8, after the word "payments," it is proposed to insert the words:

The last of said payments to be made at the expiration of five years from said entry.

And in line 9——

Mr. DAWES. The Secretary reads in line 8. It is line 9 of my bill.

Mr. PLUMB. There is a reprint. The Chief Clerk is reading from the old bill.

Mr. DAWES. Very well. If the Secretary is reading from another print I do not interrupt him.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 20, line 9, after the word "payments," it is also proposed to insert the words "The last of said payments to be made at the expiration of five years from said entry;" and in line 10 to strike out the word "four" and insert "five;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That each settler under and in accordance with the provisions of said homestead acts, shall pay to the United States for the land so taken by him, in addition to the fees provided by law, the sum of 50 cents for each and every acre, in four equal annual payments, the last of said payments to be made at the expiration of five years from said entry, and shall be entitled to a patent therefor only at the expiration of five years from the date of entry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. In section 20, line 16 of the old print, I move to add, after the word "void:"

And provided, That lands entered for town-site purposes shall be paid for at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

That makes the price conform to that now existing in regard to other portions of the public domain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 19 of the new print, in section 20, line 17, after the word "void," it is proposed to insert:

And provided, That lands entered for town-site purposes shall be paid for at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to offer an amendment which I wish to have come in at the end of the tenth section, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 10 it is moved to add:

The President may, in his discretion, allow homestead settlements to be made on each alternate quarter-section, under such rules and regulations as he may consider proper for the protection of the Indians and the enforcement of the intercourse laws, and the lands so occupied as homesteads shall be paid for as other lands ceded to the Government by the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. TELLER. I called attention yesterday to the fact that this bill left a large extent of agricultural land in the hands of a very small number of Indians comparatively, and it seems to me that if it is wise and proper to take a portion of it, it must be wise and proper to take more of it; and if the compensation made to the Indians—50 cents an acre—is fair, it would be fair if made as to the rest taken. Provided the sum paid for the present land is sufficient, the sum proposed in the amendment will be sufficient, for it is the same.

The bill provides that as to the residue of this land it shall be patented to the tribes. After it is patented to the tribe it may be patented to individuals, which patents will override pro tanto the patent to the tribe. That leaves all the unallotted land, which must be several million acres, in the hands of the tribe as a tribe under a patent. Just how that will ever be delivered from the tribe, if it becomes necessary, is a very intricate and difficult question.

I think it would be perfectly safe to put in a provision here that the President of the United States may, if he sees fit, allow alternate settlement through this tract of country to be taken by settlers on paying 50 cents an acre. If the President should be of the opinion that the Indians needed this land, or if the President should be of the opinion that such settlement might be inimical to the interests of the Indians, then, of course, he would not allow the settlement. I have also put in a provision that he may make all necessary rules and regulations to protect the rights of the Indians and enforce the intercourse laws, which, of course, will only follow as long as the tribal relation is maintained. I called attention yesterday to the fact that this tract of country would make 83,250 farms of 160 acres each, and it does seem to me that it is unwise in the interest of the Indians, that it is unwise in the interest of the white settlers of that section of country, that this great extent of territory should be locked up as it is locked up for twenty-five years by the bill as it stands.

I know that this suggestion is a departure from the long-established rule with reference to dealing with the Indian tribes and with the Indians. Ever since the organization of the Government we have followed a policy of isolation with reference to Indians upon the theory,

I suppose—I do not know what other—that the vices of the whites would ultimately destroy the Indians in their innocence and purity. The result has not been such, I think, as to induce any one to defend it very earnestly and very enthusiastically, but if that has been the correct policy heretofore it is practically impossible to continue it hereafter. We have segregated this section of country and put these Indians upon it by themselves under the bill as it now stands. In my judgment the best thing that we can do for the Indian, after he has had what land he is entitled to allotted to him (which, of course, the President would see that he got), is to give him intelligent, reputable white neighbors and associates. I believe if every alternate section could be occupied by a white settler and if that was the fact there would still be abundance of land and some more left for the allotment as provided under the bill. When that is done, then the Indian comes in daily contact not with the rougher element of society, but with the better class of people who go out to make their permanent homes on these prairie lands. The Indian children would come in contact with the white man's children. If they went to school at all on the reservation, they would go to school with the white children. If they attended church, they would attend church with white people and not solely with Indians. In this intercourse they would be taught, first, the English language necessarily; and, secondly, by example they would be taught all the advantages of civilized life; and at the same time the Indians would be protected in every right that belongs to them.

I know that this is an innovation. I understand that, and yet I believe some of the men who have given the most careful attention to this subject are of the opinion that the time has passed for continuing the old policy of isolation. Because it is proposed to open this section of country to the white settler, it does not follow that the Indian will be despoiled. The bill first provides for his allotment and his patent, and then the residue, according to my amendment, the President in his judgment may, if he sees fit, give to the settler. The land that is left is of vast extent. I think the committee have failed perhaps to recognize the fact that this extent of country is too much for those people, even if they and all their descendants are to be agriculturists. The section reserved is twice as large as the State of Vermont. It is more than half as large as the State of Indiana. It is half as large as Kentucky; it is half as large as Maine; it is half as large as several other flourishing and populous States. I can not speak from actual knowledge of this land, but I am informed that it is capable of sustaining a very large agricultural population; and yet the whole Indian tribe provided for in this bill, I think it is safe to say, does not exceed 20,000 Indians. It is not to be supposed that the increase of these Indians can make a proper appropriation of this land, and some day it is to be cut up and divided, because nobody supposes that the people of the United States, when land becomes scarce, will consent to the appropriation, even though it may be under valid ownership, of a great extent of country upon which there is no cultivation, no occupation, and no civilization. We might just as well meet this question now as postpone it for five or ten years, and put the settler with the Indian side by side under such regulations as the President may make, but see that only a reputable and respectable class of people become the occupants of that portion of the Indian lands.

I do not suppose that there will be very much disposition to adopt this amendment because of its novelty and newness, but at least I wanted to make the suggestion. I wanted to present it so that it might not be said hereafter when this question comes up the Senate acted in ignorance of the vast extent of land it was appropriating and tying up for at least the next twenty-five years.

Mr. DAWES. If this were a new question, and if we were embarking anew upon an effort to make the Indian a self-sustaining citizen of the United States and relieve the country of the burden of the present administration of Indian affairs, and if we had this land at our disposal to do with as we pleased, I would go heartily with the Senator from Colorado in the proposition which he makes, for I believe the theory which the Senator has advanced is the correct one. I think that generally it is coming now to be understood, since we have come to understand that we can not kill off the Indian and relieve ourselves of him in that way, that the best mode of relieving us of him is by absorbing him into the body-politic in the way suggested by the Senator from Colorado, mixing him as fast as possible with the white population of the country, and bringing the influences of contact with civilization to bear upon him on all sides. It is the true theory without doubt.

The Senator says, however, that we may meet this question as well now as by and by. I do not agree with him in that respect. We must go slowly in this work, and I think the Senator himself, in his administration of Indian affairs, has found greater difficulty in dealing with the too zealous people, the people who are too much in a hurry to accomplish this work instanter, than he has with the influences which hold back and desire to keep it as it is. There are good, honest, earnest people in this country who can not await the working out of the forces in their ordinary and legitimate and normal way, and they want by an enactment first to abrogate all the treaties with the Indians and throw them out upon the public without a home in which to dwell while they operate upon them, and then to declare that an Indian, nolens volens, shall be taken by force and set upon 160 acres of land in severalty, and then say the work is done. Whatever I have learned in this work, it appears a more difficult and a slower work than I ever supposed it was, and the difficulties increase in every way and in every respect.

Therefore, while I agree in the theory of the Senator, I beg him not to press this amendment at this time for this reason: We have not this land, to begin with, to do with as we please, if we have any regard for our treaty obligations. This bill depends for its ultimate effect upon the consent of three-fourths of the adult Indians who we have covenanted shall stay there forever and not be interfered with by any white man. I hope, I believe, that they will give their consent to this bill for many reasons which can be presented to them. I belive that that vast territory, 33,000 square miles, four times as large as the State which I represent and five or six times as large as three or four put together of the original States of this Union, is not forever to remain in the bosom of this great State of Dakota set apart merely for 28,000 Indians. But I believe the change can best come, will come, and can only come consistently with the faith of the United States by a religious observance on her part of her treaty obligations. So it is that I do not want to see inserted in this bill anything which can be used among those Indians to prevent their accepting the bill.

While many Indians are coming to believe very fast that the best way for them is to push out among the white people and mingle with them, there is a very strong element and a controlling element among those Indians that holds off from all contact with them.

This whole body of 33,000 square miles is held in common by six different tribes of Indians, and we are bound to secure to them their title in common. In order that each one of them might be safe from what could be done with the other tribes, it was provided in the treaty that no foot of the land should be taken from them in common without the written consent of three-fourths of the male adults of all the tribes. Now it is proposed by the bill to obtain their consent to the opening to settlement right through the center of it of 11,000,000 acres, just about half of it, a strip of itself twice as large as my own State and equal to five of the original States of the Union—as fine a country as the sun rises upon in all this nation, enough to make of itself one of the great Western States of this Union, and I hope that nothing will get into the bill that will put off that day. I hope that nothing, although in and of itself it may be good, but which we can see will have a tendency to alienate the Indians from this measure and prevent our obtaining their acceptance of it in confirmation of their treaty, will be done.

Not only do we open that, but we take the remainder and divide it up into six separate reservations, and take the title out from under this deed in common, and give to each tribe a separate title to their reservation.

Hereafter the time will come which is just as certain to come as the growth of this nation is to continue, when more of this land is to be opened to the white man and less of it will be confined to the Indian, and the time is sure to come too when the Indian will see that it is consistent with his best interests to take his abode among the white men and to take white men among them in homes and farms side by side. Yet it has not come to these Sioux. It is but ten years since they were all wild blanket Indians, gathered fifteen years ago there because they were wild, warlike Indians, and set apart there in that great country so far from the white man that we were willing to make these great and generous and expensive and burdensome stipulations in their behalf in order to induce them to give up their title to lands elsewhere.

Now, I say, we propose to cut up the remainder into six separate reservations and take it out from under this common title, so that hereafter we have but to negotiate with each one of these tribes as to their particular reservation. When the time shall come, after the white man has gone in upon this that is opened to-day and settled there among them, and after the benefit of this fund shall be felt among these Indians and the demand for more of their lands shall increase, and the Indian himself shall have been set up in severalty as far as he is fit to be set up in severalty, then negotiation with each one of these tribes will be easy, and the result which the Senator says ought to come will certainly come; but to insist upon it in this bill with the present feeling among these Indians is in my opinion to destroy the bill altogether.

The Senator speaks of the large and unnecessarily large area left to these Indians. He will allow me to allude to the commission which he sent out previous to this bill to open up a part of this territory, and their report included precisely so far as boundaries are concerned this present amount; and the Senator commended that report to the adoption of Congress, not, I have no doubt, because he did not desire to have more opened, but because he thought it wise to begin with this amount; and it is very much with that impression that the committee which followed his commission adopted substantially the same lines which his commission had, and differed with them, not in the necessity and propriety of having it opened, but only in the conditions under which it should be opened.

I urge upon the Senator to withdraw his amendment so that no irritating element shall come into this bill which will render it impossible to obtain the consent of the Indians. As the bill passed the Senate unanimously two years ago, after it had been introduced again into the Senate it was translated into the Sioux language and has been submitted at each one of these agencies in their own language to the Sioux, and there is gratifying evidence coming from all these agencies that they will, in conformity with the requirements of the treaty, accept it. Therefore while the committee have yielded to every amendment which has been offered that did not strike at the consent of the Indians, and while I know the Senator does not intend this for that purpose, it seems to those who are very familiar with the sentiment of the Indian and with the desire to carry out the beneficent results as well to the white man as to the Indian, which are bound up in this bill, that the Senator's amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. TELLER. I would not willingly and intentionally do anything that would defeat the bill or prevent the Indians who have the veto on it from expressing a favorable opinion upon it. I hardly expect the Senate to adopt this somewhat novel proposition and this departure from the old and established method of dealing with this subject. I introduced it so that I might for a moment express my opinion upon it and perhaps draw out the views of others.

I am very well satisfied with the result so far as I have gone. I have now in accordance and in harmony with myself the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs as to the principle I have enunciated. That, I think, is worth something at least. I recognize, as the Senator does who has the bill in charge, that there are many good things in the bill. I think among the very valuable features of the bill is the one he mentions that this tribe, for it is but a tribe, has been practically by this bill divided into six or seven tribes, or other branches of the tribe, and that, I think, is one method toward destroying the influence of the men who are actors in the tribe.

I wish to say, however, as the Senator alluded to land in severalty, that I have not been one of the men who believed that land in severalty was the grand panacea for all the evils that the Indian tribes were suffering. I realize how difficult it is to induce the Indians to accept land in severalty, and I know that under the bill very few of these Indians will accept land in severalty for many years to come. The principle is right when they reach the point; but when an Indian reaches the point of accepting land in severalty, he to a great extent ceases to be an Indian; he has begun at least to adopt the ideas of the white people.

I think a better amendment could be offered to the bill than the one I have offered; I think many amendments could be offered to it that would greatly benefit the bill; but I do not know whether the Indians would accept this amendment or not; I am not certain about that. I realize that there is some force in what the Senator says, when he says the Indians have been consulted and have practically agreed to this measure. As I understood, the commission were not satisfied with this report when they made it three years ago; I am sure the Department was not satisfied with it; but it was said then that it was the best we could get, and as there was a determination not to legislate except by the consent of the Indians, the commission and the Department felt compelled to accept just what they could get. As I have very little idea that the amendment will prevail, and as it may embarrass the bill, I withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to propose an amendment in section 17. Section 17 continues in effect for twenty years the provision of the seventh article of the treaty of 1868, which I will read to the Senate:

ARTICLE VII. In order to insure the civilization of the Indians entering into this treaty, the necessity of education is admitted, especially of such of them as are or may be settled on said agricultural reservations, and they therefore pledge themselves to compel their children, male and female, between the ages of six and sixteen years, to attend school; and it is hereby made the duty of the agent for said Indians to see that this stipulation is strictly complied with; and the United States agrees that, for every thirty children between said ages who can be induced or compelled to attend school, a house shall be provided, and a teacher competent to teach the elementary branches of an English education shall be furnished, who will reside among said Indians, and faithfully discharge his or her duties as a teacher. The provisions of this article to continue for not less than twenty years.

The persons who executed that treaty on behalf of the United States were all eminent men in their way. I will read their names to the Senate. The treaty is signed by N. G. Taylor, who I think at that time was Commissioner of Indian Affairs; W. T. Sherman, Lieutenant-General; William S. Harney, brevet major-general; John B. Sanborn, S. F. Tappan; C. C. Augur, brevet major-general, and Alfred H. Terry, brevet major-general United States Army. Four of the seven persons who signed on behalf of the United States, it will be observed, were at that time members of the military establishment of the United States.

Undoubtedly there was in their minds the idea of a school-house on every hill, and the Indians trudging their way thereto every day, carrying their dinners with them according to the mode of white children in the agricultural districts of the United States. But that has not been realized, and it never could have been conceived as practical by any person who had ever addressed himself to the subject seriously. I think it is a very significant illustration of what would probably result if we should turn the Indians over to the Army. Utopia would not be a circumstance.

Not only was this provision then absolutely impracticable, but it has remained so ever since. The nature of the country itself is a conclusive bar to any such thing as a school-house at such frequent intervals as this would imply. The nature of the Indian, as he has impressed it upon our knowledge during all our experience with him, shows conclusively that no such condition of things could ever be brought about. The Army of the United States would not have been sufficient to have compelled the children of the Sioux Indians to have attended these school-houses if they had been erected, as they fortunately were not.

It may be said that if the treaty was not carried into effect and no attempt made to do so, no harm was done; but did anybody ever know of a provision of that kind that did not in some way result in a claim? Even so sensible a person as the Senator from Colorado on my right [Mr. TELLER], recently Secretary of the Interior, allowed his judgment to be controlled in favor of a sentiment that in some way the Indian had been deprived of something that he ought to have by reason of our not carrying out this provision, that he should be compensated for in money, and the actuary (I suppose there is such an officer in that Department; he is necessary, judging by the use to which figures are put) was employed to determine the amount of money we owed the Indians by reason of the fact that we had not built a school-house for every thirty children in the Sioux Nation and employed a teacher for each school-house, and the sum found due figured up into the millions. More than $3,000,000, I think, was stated in the report of that officer as the amount that we owed these Indians because we did not build the school-houses and employ the teachers provided in the seventh article of the treaty which I have read.

It was a provision utterly impracticable, one which the Indians could not comply with on their part—which they did not comply with, and did not want or mean to comply with; and yet, moved by the clamor of people whose avocation consists in denouncing the Government for not doing something which they ought to do themselves, there has been brought up and put into enduring form in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I think of his superior, the Secretary of the Interior, a claim of more than $3,000,000 against the Government because of our failure to carry out the provisions of this seventh article.

Yet while that article was only to continue in force twenty years and some seventeen years of the time has elapsed, for the treaty was made in 1868, this bill proposes to continue that specific provision, a school-house for every thirty children and a teacher for every school house, for twenty years longer.

Mr. DAWES. Not in addition.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Massachusetts says "not in addition." No, Mr. President, it would be hard to add anything to a provision of that kind. The existing provision is sufficiently appalling to prevent anybody from attempting to add anything to it.

Another result which grew out of the adoption of this article was discontent among the Indians. They expected great things, and they have been swift to point out the dereliction of the Government and to excuse themselves for idleness, turbulence, discontent, by pointing to a violated treaty. It is true, as will be seen, that they obligated themselves to compel their children to attend the schools and that they never did so, nor would they have done so if the school-houses had all been there twice over. But the evil of the Government failing to fulfill a promise made was brought about and still exists.

I propose that that provision shall be qualified. In the first place it ought not to be extended beyond the term originally provided. The twenty years provided in the treaty will elapse in seven years or eight years at the furthest. I want the claim, whatever it may be now, to be cut off exactly where it is. It was $3,500,000 at the last account. The account has been running for a year since it was actuaried. I want to have it cut off now so that it will not assume any larger proportions than now exist.

While I am as desirous as any one can be, I think, that all Indian youth shall be properly educated, I should hope we would address ourselves to the subject in a practical way. No one pretends, the Senator from Massachusetts would not himself pretend, that it is effective to carry out such provision as it is proposed by this bill to extend for twenty years longer. He will not pretend that it is a wise provision if it could be carried out. He knows perfectly well that such a thing as Indian children prompted by their parents, prompted by their own instincts to learn, going from their houses to the school-house and going back again at night and repeating that operation day after day during the entire school year is something that is not to be expected and can not in the nature of things possibly be brought about. The parents would not compel their children thus to go to school and the children will not go of their own volition, and even if they would, the plan is not a good one. There are many reasons not necessary to be mentioned, which will occur to any one which show that the whole plan is impracticable and unwise.

It is not of advantage to the Indians themselves, and they know it. The Indian will only send his children to school as he is tempted by the food and clothing which they are to get, and the children will never voluntarily go except upon the same inducement. The benefits of education will not attract either parent or scholar among the Indians. It is the toothsome meal, the highly colored calico, the beads, the trinkets, the frills and furbelows which have marked our efforts at civilization among the Indians which furnish inducement to accept the benefits of education.

I propose, therefore, to submit an amendment to section 17 by inserting after the word "education," in line 5, the words:

Or some provision which may, in the judgment of Congress, be equivalent thereto and bring about the same or a better result.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 17, line 5, after the word "education," it is proposed to insert:

Or some provision which may, in the judgment of the President or of Congress, be equivalent thereto and bring about the same or a better result.

So as to read:

That in consideration of the releases on the part of the Sioux Nation of Indians in this act contained, it is hereby enacted that the seventh article of the said treaty of April 29, 1868, securing to said Indians the benefits of education, or some provision which may, in the judgment of the President or of Congress, be equivalent thereto and bring about the same or a better result, shall continue in force for twenty years from and after the time this act shall take effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. The trouble we have in all our relations with the Indians is because we enact and put into treaty form something which is not practical and which we can not carry out and do not carry out for that reason. We excite the Indian to believe that he is to have something which we know we are not going to give him. No one, with any practical knowledge of the Indian, would suppose for a moment such a provision as was contained in article 7 could be carried out. Yet Congress is denounced everywhere for not keeping its treaties with the Indians, because just such provisions as this are contained in those treaties.

A similar provision is contained in the treaty with the Navajo Indians, made by the same persons, and in other treaties made about that time, showing a vast amount of sentimentality on this question, but with no appreciation of the situation and an utter lack of common sense. I have said these provisions have led to a denunciation of Congress as being false to the honest obligations of the Government toward the Indians. Wherever we have made a proper and practicable agreement with the Indian I am in favor of keeping it; but when we come to make a new agreement I am not in favor of repeating a promise to do what we have found to be unwise and impossible of performance. The Senator from Massachusetts says that nobody has presented a money claim. It has been presented in the report of a Cabinet minister; it has been enlarged upon on the stump; it has been the subject of resolutions innumerable on the part of Indian-rights associations, and it is a pretty vigorous claim to-day.

Mr. DAWES. All that has been said is, that if reduced to a money value, the money that would have been expended in carrying out this treaty and giving these Indians this education would have equaled that sum. Nobody has come here with a claim that there should be paid to these Indians $3,000,000; and if we had expended every dollar of it in that way, counting money as the sole end to be looked after in the administration of Indian affairs to-day, we should have been relieved of this charge that we did not carry out the treaty in the spirit in which it was entered into.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not opposed to the spirit, but it is the letter which it is proposed to be here re-enacted and which is the foundation of this claim which has been set up. While it may have been as modest as the Senator from Massachusetts thinks it is, I have heard it stated a great deal broader, and it will have substance enough some of these days when it gets to be about five or six million dollars to go through Congress on a run. I want to stop that which the Senator from Massachuetts himself will freely admit, I have no doubt, as he has heretofore, is an ineffective provision, is something which we can not carry out, something which would not be good for the Indians even if we could carry it out, something totally different from that which is required by the situation of affairs.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into this discussion, but I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Kansas which may change his amendment somewhat. I agree with him that this provision of the treaty can not be carried out in its letter; but in traveling through the Indian country, and I think I visited all the tribes belonging to the Sioux Nation, I found schools in operation there wherever children could be obtained to be taught. It is true that that provision of the treaty is an absurd one applicable to those Indians, and I merely wish to put on record the statement that any claim of that nation of Indians as they are called—I call them a tribe of Indians—because of the fact that the Government has failed to provide schools for them, which they would not have, would be as absurd a claim as that provision of the treaty is absurd. They were not entitled to it.

In connection with the rest of the committee, the Senator in charge of this bill being the chairman, I talked with many of the chiefs, and some of them said that they had a claim against the Government because schools had not been provided, and yet they would not send their children to the schools. Wherever the Indian children would go to school schools were provided for them; and I was led to believe from conversing with these Indians that their claim had been suggested to them from the Indian Department of the Government, that they had been moved to it by what had been said to them by persons who ought not to have held out such inducements. I do not refer to the Interior Department, but persons connected with the Interior Department who put such an idea into their head.

I do not believe that it would be good to make this amendment to the bill at this time so far as having an effect upon the bill is concerned. The Indians have this idea, and if a provision were put in the bill striking it out they would not accept the bill. I think the bill is a good one—not as good perhaps as might be provided, but one much better than the provisions that now exist for the government and control of these Indians. I do not think that the amendment, just as it is presented, would advance the interest of the bill. If the amendment should provide exactly (I do not give the words but the idea) that such schools as are necessary, where children can be obtained to attend the schools, shall be provided by the Government, that would cover the idea that is in their minds and would cut off a great deal of the difficulty we find in the execution of that treaty in connection with the Indians.

I regard a treaty as any other measure enacted by Congress or by the Senate and the President of the United States, as treaties commonly are. I regard the Indian treaties enacted by Congress as receiving construction or at least being subject to construction the same as any law that may be passed by Congress. So I should regard such a construction placed upon this treaty as that the Government of the United States is indebted to the Indians by reason of failure on its part to provide the schools that are mentioned in the treaty, as being the construction under the circumstances that it would not be entitled to receive, for, as is known, all the schools that they themselves would send their children to are provided for them. All the six tribes—they call themselves the "six tribes;" they are all one tribe, but the six tribes of the one nation—have, or had some two or three years ago, all the schools that they themselves would provide children for in which to be educated.

Mr. TELLER. In 1867 there was a general revival in this country of interest in Indian affairs. It culminated a little later in the order of General Grant assigning to the several religious denominations a sort of supervision over the Indian agencies of the various portions of the country. About that time the commission was sent out which was mentioned by the honorable Senator from Kansas, and treaties were made not only with the Sioux but with various other tribes by the same commission, putting always this same provision in them. I have before me ten treaties, made commencing in October, 1867, and ending some time in July, 1868, in which we agreed with every tribe that we would give them a school for every thirty children. In some instances the treaty was for the cession of land; in some instances it was not for a cession of land.

It seems to have been the idea of the parties making these treaties that it would be a good thing to have a school in every neighborhood, as was suggested by the Senator from Kansas. Of course that was found impracticable at once. The Department immediately saw that it could not be done, and when attempting to carry it into execution they were met with obstacles that could not be surmounted, and there was a refusal or a neglect (whatever you may call it) both on the part of Congress to appropriate the money and on the part of the Department to attempt to put the schools all over the reservations, as it was suggested.

The Department then went to work to establish such schools as they could, dependent always, it must be remembered, upon Congress for the appropriation. There is no standing appropriation in these matters, and, of course, at every session of Congress there was an application, and the appropriations were niggardly given.

In 1883 this matter was carefully examined by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and an estimate was made as to the amount of money that must have necessarily been expended if this treaty provision had been capable of execution. I do not understand, as the Senator from Kansas does, that it has ever been presented as a claim against the Government. It was presented in the report of the Secretary of the Interior to the Senate and the House as an inducement for them to furnish a liberal amount of money for the purpose of Indian education.

I desire to say that the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has not been as thoroughly acquainted with the condition of Indian affairs on that reservation as some others have when he states that all the Indians have been put in school who were willing to go to school, for that is not a correct statement of the condition of that tribe, and, further than that, it has not been the condition of other tribes.

The sum total owing to the Sioux Indians, if regarded as a claim, is not $3,000,000, as suggested by the Senator from Kansas, but, after deducting the money expended for schools, an attempt to furnish a school for every thirty Indians would have left the Government, if it had undertaken it and succeeded, about a million and a half of money to 1883. I do not understand that it is set up as a claim, but it was set up as an argument in favor of a liberal appropriation for the purpose of putting in school not a few of the Indians, but a large percentage of the Indians. The then Secretary of the Interior had an idea that the education of ten or fifteen Indians and sending them out to a tribe was practically useless. His observation and experience, and the records of the Department sustain him in it, was that the money was thrown away, and a long and careful examination of Indian education, beginning with the very earliest days in this country, has shown that while we have spent a large amount of money for the education of Indians, yet it has been ineffective and inoperative in influencing the main body of the tribes, for the reason that when the Indian boy goes back to his home (until recently we have never attempted to educate the women) he is absorbed by the uneducated and caused to abandon what little civilization he had taken in at school.

It would be interesting, if it was not that the bill is considered in the morning hour, to examine some instances which I might mention.

The honorable Senator from Kansas says that a great many people are making claims who are not willing to do anything themselves. I realize that, and I realize the fact that the Department in dealing with this question is often and frequently embarrassed and hampered and thwarted by the overzealous conduct of the friends of the Indians. I say it with regret, because their interest is from the best of motives; but I have said, and I do not hesitate to say it again, that it is very doubtful whether the friends of the Indian in this country have not succeeded in doing him more harm than his enemies at any time in its history. But that is no reason why justice should not be done to them. I know they have not done as much as they might. They have done something. I remember that the Secretary of the Interior attempted to assist a benevolent lady who thought she could build up a school in the Creek country among the uneducated and practically uncivilized Creek Indians, and there was an effort made to get the Appropriations Committee to give her $20,000. I had the pleasure of seeing this lady the other evening, and she said to me that she had appealed to the good people of this country, and that she had three schools established without Congressional aid in the Creek country. I asked, "How much did your school cost?" She said, "My best one cost $16,000." I asked, "How is it supported?" She replied, "By voluntary contribution, and I am going over to New York now to solicit contributions to maintain my school."

Mr. President, I think it is a burning shame that the public should be called upon to contribute to the education of the Indians when the Government has undertaken to do it itself.

I think a great, strong, rich nation, paying out five millions and a half of money every year, and some years more to sustain the Indians in their savagery and barbarism, ought to be able to put out as much money as that, if it is necessary, to put every Indian boy and Indian girl in a manual-labor school and educate them, so that they will be self-supporting, and that this great tax upon the people may not continue indefinitely and to all time.

We probably have escaped practically the era of war. We have probably got where there will be very little money paid out. It has been repeated on this floor and in the public documents only a few years since that in the period of ten years the Government spent at the rate of $22,000,000 a year in Indian wars, and we have now an Indian war on our hands in Arizona and New Mexico and that region of country that will cost more money before it is concluded than the Government has paid in the last five years for Indian education. The Senate were told again and again by the public authorities charged with this trust that if they would furnish the money to put those children in school it would act as a hostage and there would be no more war. I could have taken the children of fifty Apache Indians and put them in school and saved one hundred and fifty lives in that country and millions of money; but in the absence of power in the executive department to compel children to go to school they could not be put in school, and they have been roaming over the country, and their parents are now on the war-path. I do not know that there will be another war; I did not believe three years ago that there would be another war; and yet there may be a war in the Sioux Nation, there may be a war in other sections; but if you take the children of the leading Indians, and if they are willing put them in schools, and if they are not willing take them and put them in schools, I will guarantee that you will have peace in all the Indian borders.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to correct two verbal errors in the bill while I think about them. In the first section of the amendment which I proposed, in line 13, the Secretary will notice that the proclamation of the President required to be made in section 22 should be changed to "section 24 of this act," as two sections have been inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). The amendment being verbal, the Secretary will make the change.

Mr. HARRISON. Line 22 of the second section of my amendment, now section 22 of the bill, should also be made to read "section 24 of this act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That modification will be made.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say one word in response to a sentence or two that dropped from the lips of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

I believe that I desire as much to see the Indians taken care of as any Senator, but I dislike very much to hear at every session of Congress an accumulation of accusations against the Government of the United States for the bad manner in which it is acting toward the Indians. Perhaps I am not so apt to be carried off by sentiment as some men, and that is my misfortune, but the Senator said that there would have been no war with the Apache Indians if the Government had provided schools for them. The Senator from Colorado knows it to be a fact that schools are provided, and that in New Mexico, at Albuquerque, there is a large school for the benefit of the Indians where their children may go if they are sent.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator to allow me to interrupt him, because he evidently did not understand what I said. I said the war would have been avoided if the power had been given to the Secretary of the Interior to take their children and put them in schools whether they were willing to send them or not. That was the power I contended was lacking, not that the school was not there, because there has been a school there.

Mr. LOGAN. I was going to make the remark that the school has been provided, and as to the children not being there, it may be on account of the power not having been given to the Secretary of the Interior to enforce the education; but the school has been provided by the Government.

Further than that, for years appropriations have been made at every session of Congress to provide payment for the education of the children if the Indians will only send them to the different schools all over the country. Different churches have taken charge of many of them. We have made appropriations time and again to pay the different persons who have charge of these schools so much for each Indian child who attends the school. I wish to see them educated, but I rose to make another remark.

It is not the fact that their children are not now sent to school that produces Indian wars. If Congress had gone as far as the Senator says years ago in another direction Indian wars would have ceased long ago. Ten years ago I moved an amendment myself in the Senate Chamber to make it a penal offense for any man to sell powder, ball, or gun to the savage Indians, and it was laughed at in the Senate Chamber. There is the trouble. It is because men are permitted to sell to the wild savage Indians all the implements of warfare. Right within 10 miles of where the Apache roams to-day an Indian can go to any store in that Territory and buy a gun, or a pistol, or ammunition where they are kept for sale. There is the trouble, sir, and if you will put in the law of the United States a provision forbidding any one to sell to the wild Indian, to the savage Indian that he knows will go on the war-path, the implements of war, and make it a penal offense, your wars will cease and——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg pardon of the Chair, sir. I have said all I desired to say.

Mr. TELLER. I only want to say one word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be announced.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Linoln.

Mr. TELLER. I ask consent just in this connection to say, so that I may not be misunderstood——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. I did not mean to intimate that the Apache war arose out of any failure on the part of the Government to treat those Indians properly, for I think a more indefensible outbreak has never occurred in the history of Indian outbreaks. I meant simply to say that if the Secretary of the Interior had been armed with the power to seize those children when they came back from Mexico, and had taken them away from their parents and put them in schools where their parents could not get at them, they would have been such complete hostages that there would have been no war. But that power was lacking, although the Department have for years importuned this and the other body for that power.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he will not allow this bill to be proceeded with?

Mr. HARRISON. I am under limitation in regard to the Dakota bill. There is consent that the other order of business which was laid aside, the electoral-count bill, shall come up at 2 o'clock on Monday. I can not consent to any other business intervening now. If I did, I should put myself in such a position with reference to the Dakota bill that it might not be disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. I beg to renew my appeal to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARRISON. I can not consent. This bill that has been pending this morning would occupy the whole afternoon. We see how the debate draws out on it and what broad ground it takes. The Senator can have it passed in the morning hour to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana declines to yield.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. BUTLER as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, my physical condition is the best guarantee that I shall not trespass unnecessarily on the patience of the Senate. I should not undertake to speak at all but for the fact that for some years I have taken an active interest on account of my position on the Committee on Territories in the question of the admission of Dakota, and my sole purpose, much against my personal inclination and comfort to-day, in entering this debate is to answer accusations—for I can use no other word in that connection—that partisan feeling and partisan prejudice alone cause opposition upon this side of the Chamber to the admission of Dakota as a State.

Mr. President, permit me to say that in what I shall submit to the Senate to-day I expressly disclaim, whether it meets with credence or not, any personal feeling against the people of Dakota either as a community or against any individual or number of individuals residing within that Territory.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] yesterday paid an eloquent and deserved tribute to that hardy population of frontiersmen, who, with the rifle in one hand and the ax in the other, have fought and blazed the pathway of civilization across this continent. It would be strange, indeed, if I, of all men upon this floor, should not be in accord with these sentiments most heartily and earnestly. My boyhood and manhood have been spent in the far West. I left my native State when a mere lad and became a citizen of the State which has accredited me here to a seat upon this floor before the buffalo and the Indian had left its borders. I have been since that time a Western man in heart and soul and feeling and life, and if there be one feeling that predominates with me now, it is a deep, abiding, and earnest love to the people of the great West and their institutions, even their prejudices.

Much has been said here as to the peculiar claims of this community of Dakota for admission as a State. If I discuss these assertions at all it is with no feeling of hostility personal or political, but because as a legitimate mode of discussion I am authorized to meet those assertions as bearing upon the general subject now pending in the Senate.

Much was said yesterday by the Senator from Iowa upon the peculiarly law-abiding, conservative, and Christian spirit of the people of Dakota, and the Senator in sonorous tones over and over again declaimed to the Senate, "This is not the community which could be revolutionary or in opposition to any law of the land." The connection in which this remark was made, and the manner in which it was made, seemed to indicate that there were communities from which no voice could be consistently heard attacking any other on account of lawlessness or revolution. If I notice this observation it is only because I desire to meet the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Iowa in their professions of wanting non-partisan discussion and of looking at this question from the high and elevated plane of statesmanship, far removed from the clouds and vapors of partisan prejudice, passion, and interests.

If the Senators upon the opposite side of this Chamber pretend to say that all party feeling in this question is confined to the Democratic portion of the Senate, they enter then the domain simply of assertion susceptible of no argument or proof.

In no acrimonious spirit I retort (and I use the word in its fullest meaning) by saying that the history of the Republican party shows that never for one instant have they hesitated to seize a party advantage when offered them in political warfare. The history of 1876 is too recent, the action of the Democratic party in admitting Colorado, which lost us the Presidency, is too recent, to admit of this assertion passing without contradiction upon this floor.

As I had occasion the other day in discussing this same question to say, I am no æsthetic politician. I am a Democrat. I believe in my party because I believe it is necessary to the welfare and glory and honor of this country, and I fight for my party because I so believe. I stand by my friends because they are the friends of the principles that I believe conduce to the perpetuity of the Constitution as made by the fathers. I would be coward and recreant both if I did not do it with my convictions upon this question.

Why is it necessary, or was it necessary then, that in making this declaration of non-partisan feeling both the Senators from Indiana and Iowa saw proper to drag into the debate the fact that Dakota, being a Republican Territory or State as they claimed it to be, was the only cause in fact why its admission to the Union is now opposed upon this side of the Senate? Why was it that both these Senators saw proper to go further and say that the ex-Union soldiers who had populated Dakota were restive under their exclusion from the Union because they thought they had a right to be admitted into the country whose life they had saved?

I make no namby-pamby appeal to the war sentiment of the country. I make no apology for my past history and no professions for the future. I am here accredited by two and a half million people, as intelligent, law-abiding, conservative as any upon this continent, and their votes are my credentials. I have voted consistently and persistently in this Chamber for the most liberal pensions to the men to whom I was opposed in the late unfortunate struggle, happily closed twenty years ago, and while I avow now all absence of hostility and prejudice, let it be believed or not believed, I distinctly and emphatically oppose the sentiment that any man is entitled to peculiar privileges in this country before the law or before the Constitution because he fought under any flag, because he espoused any cause, because he did his duty to the principles and convictions he held and as he understood them. Justice should be done to all, and the question now before the Senate is one appealing to the unlimited discretion of Congress, and that alone. Why bring in these adventitious circumstances? Why attempt, for it can result in nothing else, to thrust into every question, financial, social, and religious, that is brought before the American people the dead issues of a dead strife, when the country, as we heard the other day, is now for the first time really and honestly being cemented together by the glorious memories of the past and the bright anticipations of the future.

Union soldiers are restive because Dakota is kept out of the Union! Before I conclude this address I shall undertake to show that soldiers as gallant as any who fought under the Union flag and amid "shot and shell and saber-stroke" demonstrated their devotion to the Union are as heartily opposed to the passage of the bill before the Senate as any of those whose patriotic endeavor has been cited as an argument upon this floor. What can be the result or the object of such appeals as these except an indirect statement to the people in Dakota and to the country at large that many of us who were upon the other side in that unfortunate strife are now fighting to exclude Dakota, and that, forsooth, this is the sole reason of our parliamentary action in this body?

Mr. President, this is not the first time I have heard this charge. This is not the first time it has been used to inflame partisan feeling and sectional hate. Whatever may have been the object of the distinguished Senators who use it here to-day, I have seen it before clothed in not such persuasive tones, not such dulcet accents and set phrase, but containing the very same idea, the same sentiment and prejudice which we heard yesterday and the day before from the distinguished Senators.

I happen to have in my hand, from a large literary collection from the plains of Dakota which reaches me every daily mail, a journal published in this young and ambitious Commonwealth, marked all over with red lines until it is lurid and gory with anticipated war. It has even an ensanguined appearance calculated to shake the nerves of a peaceable, quiet, and conservative citizen like myself. I give it as a contribution not only to this debate but to the literature of the country. It is worthy the Addisonian era. Its smoothness of diction and force of expression would do honor to the best days of English classic literature:

> While fair Dakota has no traitors or revolutionists, unless perchance it be a straggler here or there who were in the alleged southern confederacy and are yet unrepented, be it to her credit and glory she has enough one-armed and one-legged battle-scarred veterans who fought nobly for the preservation of the Union to whip a whole brigade of traitorous skunks like VEST and BUTLER, whose arms are against them; and you can bet your boots they can do it any day right here on the open plains and free soil of Dakota, without resorting to bushwhacking or kukluxing either. If they don't believe it, all they have to do to get accommodated and test the loyalty of Dakota is to fire on Sumter.

Now, Mr. President, permit me to put to rest any apprehensions upon the part of this blood-thirsty gentleman in Dakota, so far as the inauguration of another revolution is concerned. Speaking for myself, Fort Sumter shall rest in placid tranquillity for the rest of my natural life at least. The admission of no twenty States would ever induce me to appeal again to the arbitrament of arms which this gentleman seems so anxious now to invoke, if the Senator from South Carolina and myself should pay our own traveling expenses in order to meet him and his comrades upon the plains of Dakota.

Although the distinguished Senators who have spoken disavowed indirectly, if not directly, any advocacy or approval of the extraordinary position assumed by the applicants from Dakota in regard to their right to form a State without the consent of Congress, although, I say, they indirectly, without intending to do them injustice while they perhaps directly disavowed such a disposition—I undertake to say that there are numbers of the prominent and leading men in Dakota, men conducting the press, men who lead the people so far as they can upon the hustings and in the public councils, who not only have avowed the position to which I have alluded but who have not retracted it and do not propose to retract it, and who to-day assert their right to form a State government, and who declare that they have formed a State government now in existence without any consultation with Congress or any deference to its opinion.

The Senator from Indiana in the report which he submitted to this body alluded to this sentiment as expressed in the public press of Dakota on the subject of division as an indication of the opinion of the people in that Territory. Now, to make good what I have stated in regard to the position now occupied by the leading men of Dakota, the position that they are a State already and they do not assume Statehood by virtue of any consent on the part of Congress but proprio vigore by the act of the people alone, I read in the first place from a pamphlet called "The State: How it may be formed from the Territory," 5,000 and more copies of which I understand were distributed by the advocates of division and Statehood over Dakota, and which is obviously prepared with great care and indorsed by a long list of prominent men as being the sentiment of that people. On the 17th page of this pamphlet I find from the Press and Dakotian, the leading newspaper of Southern Dakota, under the heading of "The Right to Statehood," the following:

Under law, precedent, and court decisions, we are possessed of greater rights than was supposed. We have the undoubted authority to meet in convention and adopt a constitution. The same being ratified by the people, we have the right to elect State officers, to provide our own courts, to collect taxes, and to manage our own affairs. Should the provincional organization provided by the General Government refuse to recognize the government provided by the people, such refusal would not in any degree affect the legality of that government. Should Congress decline to admit our representatives, for the time being, that act would not take from us the privilege of governing ourselves here at home. We are possessed of the one requisite—a sufficient number of people to entitle us to admission into the Union—and the General Government has no authority whatever to deny us the right of self-government, which is guaranteed to all, under the Constitution and the laws. We are therefore in favor of immediate State organization, in the absence of any act of the authorization or consent upon the part of the Government at Washington. We are in favor of it because the time has arrived when we should manage our own affairs and not be longer subjected to the governing power of men appointed from the States. We are in favor of it because it is our constitutional right, privilege, and duty. The provisional government would be compelled in time to yield to such an arrangement—

That is the Territorial government—and if it chose for a period to maintain an unrecognized organization no one would be injured by the harmless diversion. The legal, constitutional government would be the people's government, and before it mere assumption of delegated power could not prevail.

In the conclusion of this pamphlet under the twelfth clause we find as the sum and substance of this whole argument the following:

That the people having been by this action of the governor deprived of the ordinary means of declaring and executing their lawfully ascertained and expressed will, have full and unquestioned right and authority to fall back upon and exercise the reserved rights and extraordinary powers vested in them by the constitution, and have therefore, for that purpose, full power to call and create a constitutional convention, a constitution and a State government by their own spontaneous action, and by such methods and instrumentalities as they may in their primary and sovereign capacity establish and ordain to that end.

If that be not to the full extent and limit of the doctrine that the people of any Territory in this Union have the right by their reserved power, disregarding the will of Congress, disregarding the provisions of the Constitution, to form a State and exercise all the right of Statehood, then the English language has lost its scope and meaning. Will the Secretary be kind enough now to read the editorial which I send to the desk, coming from another newspaper in Dakota?

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STRAIGHT FROM THE SHOULDER—THE TIME ARRIVED WHEN THE PEOPLE OF DAKOTA SHOULD STAND BY THEIR RIGHTS.

Carthage Prairie Home: Should Congress neglect to admit the State of Dakota during the present session, our duty is plain.

The Legislature should be reconvened and the machinery of the State put in steady motion.

There is no law to forbid the people of a Territory, when their number and area of territory are sufficient, to form a State.

There is no law to forbid the people of a State governing themselves.

On the contrary the highest law of the land, and the action of twelve States of the Union, in each instance accepted by a special act of Congress, affirms both of these propositions.

Shall Dakota then, with her 270,000 people, her 80,000 and more square miles, larger than all six of the New England States, with New Jersey and Delaware combined, consent longer to be a vassal?

No! a thousand times no!

Shall the twenty thousand scarred veterans now residing in Dakota, who marched through the burning sands and miasmatic swamps of the South to put down a wicked rebellion, stand with bared heads and beg longer of their old opponents in arms to be admitted to the Union they helped to save?

We say again, ten thousand times no!

Men of '61-8, stand upon your rights as freemen. Stand by the old flag and bear it aloft. Stand firm without wavering. Stand by your new State, stand by Dakota. You conquered the rebels with guns in their hands; you will again conquer rebs with their Congressional votes, even if Dakota must remain out of the Union until an uprising of the free men of the States drives the old rebel yell from the halls of Congress. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. Statehood for Dakota by the people and for the people is liberty for the people.

Mr. VEST. If it be said that this is mere journalistic rhetoric I have only to reply that the newspapers of a Territory as well as a State almost invariably follow public sentiment instead of attempting to create it. They adopt a political maxim which a very distinguished political leader in this country once announced, that the safest and most successful politician was the man who followed the people and never attempted to lead them. It may not be the most high and elevated statesmanship, but it is certainly the most successful both in conducting a newspaper and in securing votes in order to obtain office. I could, if my feeble strength permitted, exhaust myself and the patience of the Senate by reading for hours extracts similar to this coming from all portions of this pretended State.

I have not had this extract read on account of its allusion to the events of the late war or the differences which grew out of that conflict. I recognize the fact that there are some people who can discuss no question without bringing in that war, without making a merit of the fact that they served in the Federal Army, and that this simple fact covers all the remainder of their natural lives no matter how great their blunders or even their crimes. Because of my personal experience I have had some occasion to note the fact, and when the epithet traitor and rebel is hurled in my face, dragged from the remote battlefields of the war to be brought into foreign issues and foreign discussion, I am often reminded of an episode in the impeachment trial of President Johnson. The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], not now in his seat, told his adversaries that they reminded him of that pious old lady who, when driven to extremities in defending a Calvinistic dogma, declared emphatically that take away her total depravity and you took away her religion. Take away the war issues and you take away the politics of a large number of newspapers and statesmen in this country.

As I said before, I would be glad to hear any one Senator upon either side of this Chamber stand in his place and declare that he believed that any portion of the American people on any portion of the American domain had a right to form a State with the powers and privileges of a State without the consent and validating power of Congress. I should like to hear any Senator make that assertion; yet that is the doctrine being inculcated, and as an American Senator I have a right in legitimate discussion to call attention to what I conceive this heresy, in order that now and here it may receive the answer which I say it shall always receive in every age of this Republic, no matter what loose expressions may be taken from the utterances and expressions of distinguished men who had then in their hands and under their control measures for the admission of States.

The Senator from Indiana says Montana has applied here for admission with a constitution, and yet he hears nothing upon this side of the Chamber in regard to revolution there, because Montana is a Democratic Territory and it is assumed will come in as a Democratic State.

In this connection let me say parenthetically in answer to another assertion of the Senator from Indiana, not to disavow it as truth, but to show that no partisan feeling will make me swerve from what I believe to be the meaning of the Constitution and my constitutional duty as a member of the Senate, when I made a report four years ago from the Committee on Territories as representing the minority that the spirit of the Constitution and legislation of the country demanded that no Territory should be admitted without a population equal at least to the ratio that would entitle it to a member in the lower House of Congress, I meant what I said irrespective of any political success or strife, and if Montana comes here with less than the ratio sufficient to entitle her to a member in the lower House of Congress I here and now pledge myself as a Democrat to vote against her admission, because I believe it would be a violation of the spirit and intendment of the Constitution as made by its framers. Although it would give to the Democratic party three electoral votes in the next canvass, if Montana comes here—and I see a delegation is on its way headed by my warm and special friend, the friend of my boyhood, Governor Hauser—although that delegation is on its way here, as I see by this morning's paper, to urge the immediate admission of Montana with 120,000 or 125,000 population, I state here distinctly that I shall not give my vote for the admission of that or any other Territory although every voter within its limits may be a Democrat as strongly rooted in the opinions of the party as I myself am to-day, without it has the ratio of population necessary to give it a member in the lower House of Congress.

But returning from this little digression to what I was about to say in regard to the parallel instituted or attempted to be instituted by the Senator from Indiana between these two Territories, I deny that Montana comes here like Dakota. I will prove from the record, unless party prejudice and passion blind the observer, that Montana comes in a very different spirit, in a very different mood, with different expression and different intendment when she approaches the representatives of the people in Congress assembled. I will trespass upon the Secretary again, to read, if he pleases, Exhibit B from the report of the Senator from Indiana, to see what is the proposition of Dakota and in what terms it is couched.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

EXHIBIT B.

OFFICE OF STATE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
Yankton, Dak., December 7, 1885.

SIR: We, the State executive committee of the State of Dakota, on this behalf appointed by a constitutional convention of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of latitude, have the honor to herewith transmit to you a certified copy of the constitution of the State of Dakota and of a memorial from the constitutional convention to the President and Congress of the United States.

We have also forwarded through the hands of Hon. BENJAMIN HARRISON, United States Senator, an engrossed and certified copy of the constitution for presentation to the Senate through the President thereof.

I am instructed, on behalf of the constitutional convention of Dakota, to request you to have the said memorial and constitution duly presented to the Senate of the United States for their consideration, and that the same be referred to the proper committee and acted upon as the application of said convention, for and on behalf of the people of said State, for the admission of the State into the Union.

Yours, respectfully,

HUGH J. CAMPBELL,
President State Executive Committee.

To the honorable PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE of the Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C.

Mr. VEST. Without attempting to wrest words and phrases from their legitimate and natural meaning, who can read this application without seeing at once in every line and syllable of it the assertion that this is the State of Dakota without any action on the part of Congress. These gentlemen come here as the executive committee of a convention of people who have formed a constitution and inaugurated Statehood.

It has been said here over and over again that this is simply a proposition. Yes, Mr. President, it is a proposition from a State outside of the Union for admission into the Union, and that alone. It is a State not within the confederacy of the States, and it is this, and nothing more and nothing less.

It is sought to escape this conclusion, which is plain and patent in every line and syllable of this memorial, by stating that one provision of the constitution of this so-called State says that the Legislature shall pass no bills except in regard to the measures necessary to obtain admission, and that this takes away any assumption that it is a State or entitled to the rights of Statehood.

Any one who reads with fairness and impartiality that provision of the so-called constitution of the State of Dakota will see that it is simply a limitation upon the power of the Legislature, and nothing more. The State is established, its officers are elected, its powers are vested, and the sovereign power of the people in convention assembled has simply said to the Legislature, "While you exist, while you are a constitutional body, while you are de facto and de jure in existence, we limit your power as to legislation in so far that you shall not pass any bills other than those necessary to secure the admission of Dakota into the confederacy or union of States." It is exactly equivalent to that oft-repeated exercise of conventional power which was had in this country so frequently in 1861, in the border States at any rate, when a convention was called to consider the relations between the State and the Federal Union, and when the Legislature which called the convention put in the act which brought the convention into being and in esse the limitation that it should not pass any ordinance dissolving the relations of the State to the Federal Union without having submitted the same to a vote of the people. Unquestionably that power existed in the creating body. Unquestionably the convention had the right to put a limitation upon the legislative power of this Legislature; but that proves nothing against the statement which I have made and which I say is incontrovertible upon the record, that these people in Dakota mean now that they have organized a State proprio vigore, with the reserved rights and powers of the people, irrespective of any action or consent on the part of Congress.

Let us look for a moment at the language used by Montana, and let any fair and candid Senator place the two side by side and then say that the cases are parallel. I ask the Secretary to read the memorial of the Montana convention, which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Pursuant to an ordinance adopted by the constitutional convention of the Territory of Montana, begun and held at Helena, Mont., on January 14, A. D. 1884, and concluded February 9, 1884, the undersigned committee have the honor to submit herewith the following memorial, adopted by said convention:

"To the honorable the President of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

"Your memorialists, the people of Montana Territory, through their representative in Congress assembled, respectfully represent:

"That since the organization of the Territory of Montana we have cheerfully yielded obedience to the laws of the United States and recognized the right of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories:

"That we now disclaim any purpose of disloyal action, but renewing our fealty to the Constitution of the United States, and recalling to mind the right of the people to peacefully assemble and by petition represent their grievances to Congress, do further represent:

"That the policy which has so long prevailed of sending strangers to rule over us and fill our offices has become distasteful to us, and is wholly unsuited to our present condition and the growing importance of the diversified interests of our country:

"That within the past few years our population and resources have been largely augmented, whereby the proper administration of our laws demands a more perfect and comprehensive system of Government than can ever be attained under our Territorial organization:

"That in order to enlarge our liberties, secure a closer connection with the American Union, and for the establishment and maintenance of a better government, your memorialists, with the consent of the Legislative Assembly, have met in convention and framed a constitution, republican in form, for the State of Montana, and herewith present a certified copy thereof for your approval; and if, upon consideration of the same, you find it unobjectionable in substance and form, your memorialists pray that the Territory of Montana be speedily admitted into the Union of the United States thereunder, and your memorialists will ever pray."

Delegate in Congress.

Mr. VEST. It will be observed from the terms of this memorial that there is no claim that Montana is a State either out of the Union or in it. There is not the slightest assumption of Statehood. It is the Territory of Montana. They do not come here as the executive committee of a constitutional convention and say, "We represent a State, and we bring to you our constitution for you to consider it, and we apply for admission into the Union as a sovereign State;" but this application on the part of Montana comes as it should come to the Congress of the United States, clothed by the Constitution with unlimited discretion in regard to the admission of new States, and says, "This Territory submits to you a constitution which we have formed, not of our own right but in order that the Congress may consider it as a proposition for our admission into the Union of States."

It has been said here that Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Gallatin held that the people of a Territory could form themselves into a State by virtue of their own reserved powers. As I have said before, party strife and party feeling have caused expressions to emanate from high authority which are not to be accepted as legitimate argument or precedent. Mr. Buchanan did use some loose expressions when he had charge of the Michigan bill, for the Michigan and Arkansas bills were put under the control of himself and Mr. Benton, and Mr. Benton used some expressions which are susceptible of the interpretation placed upon them by the Senator from Indiana; but I undertake to say, and I will show from the record, that the deliberate convictions of Mr. Buchanan, even assuming that he had any right to interpret this sacred instrument, the Constitution of the United States, for us, that his declarations delivered and formulated with care were very different from any such statement as that which is ascribed to him in this debate. In the Appendix to the Congressional Globe for 1836–'37, after a week had elapsed between the first debate on the admission of Michigan and when Mr. Buchanan took the floor in answer to Mr. Calhoun, he used this language:

Mr. Buchanan here said that, as one of the majority, the position he took and maintained with all the ability in his power was, that under the ordinance of 1787, Congress, having first fixed the boundaries of the State (and even if Michigan contained the population prescribed by the ordinance), she nevertheless had no right to come in under that ordinance.

In other words, that it was a question for Congress; that, as the Constitution itself prescribes, Congress can admit new States, Congress can make all needful rules and regulations in regard to the territory and other property of the United States.

As I said the other day, with no intention to be disrespectful to the people of Dakota, although the excessive sensibility of the Senator from Indiana construed my statement into a reflection upon that people, but simply to illustrate the result of any such doctrine, suppose that Utah should apply here with requisite population, a population of even a million, with requisite area, and should bring a constitution here and elect Senators and claim admission into the Federal Union, what would be the result? Suppose that a dozen ordinances had provided that the territory of which Utah is part should be carved into States, is there any pretense that Congress would be bound to admit her? Is there any pretense that Congress would not under its constitutional power, above and beyond all treaties which Congress can abrogate at pleasure, and all ordinances which Congress can annul at their own will, refuse to admit that Territory as a State?

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] reminds me that Utah did organize a State government and called it the State of Deseret, and a volume of statutes can now be found in the Library embracing the statutes that were made by the Legislature of that so-called State; but Congress never recognized her Statehood, and to-day the application of the State of Utah, with an area twice as great as that of Dakota and a population five times as great, would be treated, as we all know, with contempt and scorn.

Population itself is not sufficient, territory is not sufficient, institutions even are not sufficient; and I put the most extreme position before the Senate. Congress is the trustee for all the people of all the States of the Union, and it is for us to say, in this sovereign power confided to us as the representatives of the people and of the States, whether it is best to increase the number of Senators, whether it is best to make new States, whether our duty to the rest of the people of the Union and the circumstances by which we are surrounded justify us in admitting any State within the brotherhood of the American Union.

Mr. Buchanan, reading further, said, on page 149:

He agreed with the Senator—

as to the fact that Michigan was now a State, though not a confederate State; but there had been another proposition advanced by him, to which he never could yield his assent. The Senator had contended that a Territory, after it had adopted a constitution in pursuance of an authority granted by Congress for that purpose, would rise up at once into the rank of a sovereign and independent State, no longer subject to the control of this Government. What, sir! Would the Territory of Wisconsin, for example, if Congress had authorized her to form a constitution, and she had adopted one of a republican character, from that moment become a sovereign and independent State? Could she then refuse to enter the Union? Could she dispose of our public lands within her limits? Could she coin money and perform every other act pertaining to an independent sovereignty? Did gentlemen intend to push their doctrine of State rights to such an extreme, and thus enable every Territory to rise up into a foreign State and put Congress and the Union at defiance? If this doctrine be not revolutionary with a vengeance, he did not know what could be so called. No, sir; our Territories belong to us. They are integral parts of the nation. We authorize their people to erect themselves into States, subject to our approbation; but, until they actually enter the Union, they continue in a subordinate condition and are subject to our control.

If there could be any doubt about a proposition which seems to me to be too self-evident for argument, Mr. Buchanan disposed of this whole question.

Mr. Calhoun, to whom Mr. Buchanan was replying, is reported as follows:

Mr. Calhoun came now to a point of not much less importance; he meant to the principle broadly laid down, without qualification, that a Territory could not become a State until admitted. He would refer Senators to the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, and if they had any doubts on the subject they could easily satisfy them. He contended that nothing but States could be admitted into the Union. This Union was a union of States—not Territories—not of people bound together by a settled compact and lease. How, then, could a Territory give its assent? It had no will of its own. How could a Territory be admitted into the Union? But it was said that if this doctrine be true, a Territory, if even she should become a State, might refuse to come into the Union. Most certainly; no State could be forced into the Union. We all know the history of our Constitution. Every State assented to the Constitution, and came in voluntarily, otherwise this would not have been a Federal Union. Why, it grew out of the noble theory of our Constitution. Had we forgotten, in the course of half a century, the splendid theory of our Government—that all people have a right to govern themselves, and that the will of the people is to govern? Was it not the basis of our revolution, which has done more to spread free principles all over the world, than anything which had occurred since?

But, while Mr. Calhoun held this doctrine, to which I do not assent myself, that this is a State before it is admitted into the Union, he declared emphatically and distinctly that the people did not have the right to assume the legislative powers of Statehood until Congress had given its consent, until Congress had vitalized the action of the people in assuming to form a State government.

But we are told that by virtue of the ordinance of 1787 Dakota is entitled to admission, that having obtained the requisite ratio of 60,000 population this matter is settled, crystallized, res adjudicata, by virtue of that celebrated ordinance. If that be true, it is an end of this discussion. If that be true, it is an end of the constitutional discretion of Congress; it is only necessary to take a judgment by default, to read the ordinance of 1787 and pass pro forma the act of admission of this Territory into the Federal Union.

I propose now to read from 10 Howard Reports, page 94. The Supreme Court of the United States, I think, has definitely settled this question as to the effect of the ordinance of 1787:

But the whole question upon the ordinance of 1787—and the acts of Congress extending it to other territory afterwards acquired, was carefully considered in Pollard vs. Hagan, 3 How., 212. The subject is fully examined in the opinion pronounced in that case, with which we concur; and it is sufficient now to refer to the reasoning and principles by which that judgment is maintained without entering again upon a full examination of the question.

Says the court—

Indeed, it is impossible to look at the six articles which are supposed in the argument to be still in force without seeing at once that many of the provisions contained in them are inconsistent with the present Constitution. And if they could be regarded as yet in operation in the States formed within the limits of the northwestern territory, it would place them in an inferior condition as compared with the other States, and subject their domestic institutions and municipal regulations to the constant supervision and control of this court.

But husbanding my strength, I come to the conclusion of the argument of the court as delivered by Chief-Justice Taney:

As we have already said, it—

That is, the ordinance of 1787—

ceased to be in force upon the adoption of the Constitution, and can not now be the source of jurisdiction of any description in this court:

This is the case of Strader et al. vs. Graham, in 10 Howard. If this opinion does not put an end at once to the assumption that the ordinance of 1787 gives to any portion of this Territory the right to admission by virtue of the terms of the ordinance into the Federal Union, I am unable to read or to deduce the legitimate effect of any decision of the highest tribunal in the country.

The court says emphatically and distinctly that the ordinance of 1787 ceased to exist upon the adoption of the Federal Constitution in 1789, that the Constitution took its place, and that it can not be quoted in the Supreme Court of the United States as a source of jurisdiction for any purpose whatever, either as to the right of a State or a Territory; and that, it seems to me beyond question, without reading the case in 3 Howard quoted here, is an end of this assumption, which if it were true would put an end at once and forever to any discretion upon the part of Congress as to the admission of new States in the Northwest.

So of the treaty by which the Louisiana Territory was acquired from France in the administration of Mr. Jefferson. I take the broad ground here and now, and I say it is incontrovertible, and I take it deliberately, that no ordinance, no treaty, no act of Congress, can take away from this Congress the power to exercise its constitutional discretion in regard to the admission of States into the Union. We can repeal any treaty, we can tear to pieces any precedent act of Congress if we see proper, because if we can not, then one Congress can bind all subsequent Congresses, and this constitutional discretion given to us and us alone as trustees for the general welfare of the people of all the States would be absolutely nullified and destroyed.

We have heard here, and it has been quoted in pamphlets issued by these aspiring statesmen in Dakota as if conclusive on this question, that Chief-Justice Taney in the celebrated case of Dred Scott vs. Sandford decided that the Government of the United States could not hold colonies. Who has ever denied it? What man upon either side of the great political issues of this country has ever brought any doubt to bear upon this plain and self-evident proposition? We know that the structure of our Government is such that we can never become under our present Constitution the holder of colonial possessions. We can only hold territory for the purpose of making it at some future time into States. We can not as can Great Britain stretch out Briarean arms to the four quarters of the earth until the drum-beat follows our possessions from the rising to the setting of the sun. The men who made the Constitution, the wisest men who have ever existed upon this continent in the general scope and meaning of their work, although they made lamentable mistakes in regard to details which only God himself could have foreseen—those great men never intended that we should become the holder of colonies as the powers of Europe have been for the last three hundred years.

But did Chief-Justice Taney ever say or mean to say, and where is the expression that ever intimated, that any Territory at the end of any given number of years or indefinite term of years could come and of right demand admission into the Union? Did Chief-Justice Taney ever pretend to intimate that Congress did not have the exclusive right and the sole discretion in regard to the formation and admission of new States?

It is said in Dakota, "why, they may hold us forever in pupilage." Mr. President, that is a question for the representatives of all the people of all the States; not for them to determine but for us to determine. The State of Missouri was held in pupilage and vassalage, as it is termed in these pamphlets, two years and a half upon a party issue, and her Senators, Barton and Benton, wandered through these halls without, politically speaking, a place whereon to lay their heads; and Congress at last admitted Missouri upon a compromise, as Michigan was admitted and Arkansas was admitted, and did it under the broad and wide discretion vested in Congress by the Constitution.

I have dwelt longer upon this branch of the discussion than I purposed. Alluding very briefly to an observation made by the Senator from Iowa and which was also made, though not in the same terms, by the Senator from Indiana, that political motives alone actuate this side of the Chamber, I may be permitted to ask if it would not be an equally good case and equally as logical for me to inquire what party would profit by the admission of Dakota, and whether there is any interest apparent to the Republican party in rushing this State into the Union? It would give to the Republicans 3 electoral votes if not 4. If they have the population they claim in Southern Dakota, it would give to them in the next electoral college 4 votes, and we know what that means in the present condition of parties in this country.

What right have Senators to hurl at this side of the Chamber the charge of partisan feeling and prejudice when upon the very face of this record, so to speak, the fact is transpiring that by the admission of this State, cut in two by this Cæsarian operation of the constitutional convention, originating without the consent of Congress and by the innate and reserved powers of the people, as they express it, the southern half of Dakota coming into the Union would give the political ascendancy perhaps in the whole Union to the Republican party in the next Presidential election.

So much for anything that savors of political feeling or bias in this question. Let us come now, and I propose to meet the Senator from Indiana upon the high plane of argument, non-partisan, patriotic, national, to which he has invited us. If I do not satisfy every Senator present that logic, right, reason, justice, all forbid us to pass this bill, I shall consent to be held convicted under the rather harsh criticism of the Senator from Indiana made the other day, that I could not treat this Dakota question without using unjustifiable terms in regard to the people of that Territory. If the distinguished Senator knew with how much pain I fall beneath his displeasure at any time, I am sure he would suspend his scholastic criticism until the end of this debate.

Mr. President, I meet him now upon the arena to which he has invited us and which he himself so soon abandoned. I propose now to look at the considerations which should govern every proposition for the admission of a new State into this Union. Precedents are the poorest arguments imaginable when this wide and unlimited discretion is given by the Constitution to Congress in each individual case. Each State must be admitted or rejected upon the circumstances which surround that State and the rest of the States of the Union at the time it applies for admission. We are not to go back to party conflicts when slavery and anti-slavery, when the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of public lands or the non-distribution of them tore the country into factions and parties. We are living men, dealing with living issues. There was a time in the history of this country when the only thing that was held by American statesmanship to be necessary for building broad and wide the foundations of the Republic was more people to fill up our vast domain, then stretching from ocean to ocean. All the States were interested then in pushing the frontier away from them, because the frontier meant the scalping-knife and tomahawk of the Indian. Every State could be confidently relied upon to vote for the admission of a frontier State, because that put an Anglo-Saxon population between the inhabitants of the older States and the wild Indians of the plains.

What are the circumstances that surround us now? The question of population beggars the imagination even of the poet. It is not a question of how many people we shall have; but how shall we stop or meet the exigencies of the tremendous population pouring upon us from all quarters of the earth? The question is not now to push off our frontier to get rid of the Indian, but, as we heard to-day, how are we to save these poor savages from the annihilation which seems almost inevitable? No longer do the Five Nations, with the genius of Tecumseh and of the Prophet, appal the frontiersman in Ohio and Indiana and Illinois; no longer do those nations meet as nations; but go, as I did some years ago, even last summer, to the plains of Montana and Dakota, and you find the remnants of those splendid nations now huddled around their miserable camp-fires, the beggarly remnants of a fast decaying nationality. The days of war for the Indian are over. From the immense area, 200 miles by 400 miles, of mountains, the refuge of the Apaches, sporadic forages may be made by ten or twenty savages upon unprotected settlements and upon isolated frontiersmen; but even this must necessarily and logically come to an end before the overwhelming power of this nation as represented by its military force.

I repeat that the days of war with the Indian are past and gone. The circumstances that surrounded our fathers when it was only necessary to answer all arguments against the admission of a State by saying, "Push away the frontier; in numbers there is strength"—those days are gone and these arguments have died with them. The question upon us now as practical statesmen with living issues is how large is to be the Senate, how much are we to subdivide these enormous Territories. It is not for Dakota by the action of her own people to cut herself in two and then come here with the eloquent pleading of the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Indiana and demand that she shall be admitted into the Union or else an outrage is perpetrated upon a portion of the sovereign people of the United States. If that is done, Senators, it will be but a few years until the Senate will swell into the size almost of the House of Representatives, for if you look at the extent, at the area of the Territories you will see that what Dakota can do or attempts to do will be done by the other Territories of the United States. Dakota has 149,100 square miles; Montana has 146,131 square miles; New Mexico has 122,580 square miles; Arizona has 113,020 square miles—three Territories with this enormous area; and if we now say to Dakota, as the Senators from Indiana and Iowa would have us say, "Cut yourself in two, adopt a constitution, elect State officers, elect two Senators, come to Congress and say that you are veteran soldiers and maimed veterans of the war, and you can be admitted into this Union," the precedent of Dakota has settled the question.

Mr. President, it is said that a great outrage is being perpetrated against this people in refusing them Statehood. A glowing picture was drawn of their conservatism, their law-abiding spirit, their respect for religion and law, by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Indiana. An outrage is perpetrated for partisan effect by Senators upon this side of the Chamber in voting against the admission of this State. The Senator from Iowa says gross accusations are made against the character of that people. When? Where? How?

For two years Dakota was kept out of this Union by votes upon that side of this Chamber, and the record shows it. In 1882 a bill similar in its provisions to that now before the Senate was brought here, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] declared that until Dakota purged herself of repudiation he would never consent to her admission into the brotherhood of States, and for two years, as parties then stood in the Senate, the Senator from Maine held this power over Dakota and forced her, I might say at the point of the political bayonet, to pay her honest debts.

Sir, I have the record. Is it necessary for me to remind my distinguished friend from Indiana when he and myself contended over this question for two if not three recurring sessions of Congress? Here is the record. When I inadvertently the other day in speaking of the Dakota bond case mentioned that Judge Moody sat upon the bench when the decision was made in order to acquit myself of any intentional discourtesy for that gentleman, with whom I have not the pleasure of an acquaintance and against whom I have nothing to say, I call the attention of my friend from Indiana to the language of my own report, which I had not seen for four years—not since our last discussion, at any rate—in which I used the following language:

> No taxes have been levied for the purpose of paying interest on these bonds, and no interest has been paid upon them since the year 1876. In that year the Hon. G. C. Moody (one of the parties who lately appeared before our committee to advocate the bill for the admission of the Territory as a State) filed a bill and obtained a decision from the Territorial courts that said bonds were illegal and void. Judge A. H. Barnes (who also lately appeared before our committee to advocate the bills for division and admission) was at that time one of the judges of the supreme court of the Territory.

It was a mere inadvertence when I made this statement. I recollected distinctly that Judge Moody had been prominent in this litigation, but I meant nothing to his discredit. I never intimated that the judges who decided the case in the Territorial court acted corruptly. Two of them were Judge Shannon and Judge Bennett; I have quoted from one already in former discussions, and I propose to quote from the other before this debate is ended. They decided as lawyers and decided as they conceived their judicial duty to dictate. But when we see the picture vividly drawn of the law-abiding conservative character of the population of Dakota, and the expression has been used that this is not the sort of community which would be guilty of any revolutionary methods, these gentlemen must recollect that there are blows to receive as well as blows to give. They must remember that the record can be read by us all, and that the record shows that this is not the first appearance of the Territory of Dakoto in opposition to the constituted authorities of the United States.

After the decision was made against the legality and validity of these bonds by the Territorial courts (and for the benefit of Senators not familiar with the antecedent history of this case I now mention that these were bonds issued for the construction of railroads running from Yankton in the southern portion of Dakota by the county of Yankton and $15,000 of them by an adjacent county, and the Territorial courts decided that these bonds were illegal and void), the case was taken by the bondholders, who were non-residents of the Territory, to the Supreme Court of the United States. In 101 United States Reports the decision will be found, and the Supreme Court decided not only that the bonds were legal but they decided some other things in regard to the power of Congress over the Territories which are pertinent to the discussion now in hand. Said the Supreme Court of the United States in that decision:

> All territory within the jurisdiction of the United States, not included in any State, must necessarily be governed by or under the authority of Congress. The Territories are but political subdivisions of the outlying dominion of the United States. Their relation to the General Government is much the same as that which counties bear to the respective States, and Congress may legislate for them as a State does for its municipal organizations.
> Congress may not only abrogate laws of the Territorial Legislatures, but it may itself legislate, directly, for the local government. It may make a void act of the Territorial Legislature valid, and a valid act void. In other words, it has full and complete legislative authority over the people of the Territories, and all the departments of the Territorial government. It may do for the Territories what the people, under the Constitution of the United States, may do for the States.
> No complaint is made of any irregularity in the proceedings under the law. The question in the case is one of power only, and we think the vote of the people of the county was validated by Congress, and express authority given to issue the bonds for the purpose originally intended. The only change which Congress saw fit to make was to require the company to give stock in return for the donation voted.
> The judgment of the supreme court of the Territory will be reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to reverse the judgment of the district court, and direct a judgment for the plaintiff on the facts found, for such amount as shall appear to be due on the coupons sued for.

That should have been an end of this litigation with a conservative, law-abiding people worthy of the encomiums passed upon them so eloquently yesterday by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON]. Was it the end? If anathemas and criticisms are to be hurled at this side of the Chamber and by implication against the States which are represented here by Senators the equals under the Constitution and peers of any in this Hall, then the Senators must remember that it is the first duty of a lawyer to stand by the record, and this record shows that instead of bending to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States the people of Dakota deliberately—I do not say of Yankton County alone, but of the whole Territory—entered into a conspiracy to nullify the decision of the Supreme Court, and passed certain acts of the Territorial Legislature which absolutely made it impossible to collect the judgment the Supreme Court of the United States said should be collected. They passed, in the first place—the people of the entire Territory coming to the assistance of the people of Yankton—an act repealing the law authorizing a levy upon the property of the county for the payment of any judgment obtained against it. (See Session Laws of Dakota for 1881, page 63.) They passed another act enabling the county commissioners to effect an immediate determination of their official powers by filing a resignation with the county clerk. (See Session Laws of Dakota for 1881, page 219.) They passed another act authorizing Yankton County to sell $200,000 of stock which it had received from the railroad company at the time the bonds were issued; and to enable the county to coerce the bondholders into a discount of 50 per cent. on the dollar, the act further provided that the money obtained on such stock should constitute a special fund to be used only in the settlement of the indebtedness of Yankton County at 50 cents on the dollar. (See Session Laws, 1881, page 305.) Sixteen thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents were obtained by Yankton County on the sale of the stock which they had received of this railroad on this subscription, and when the United States authorities, acting through the courts, attempted to secure this money in payment of the judgment rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States, the county officers resigned and then met to transact the county business at midnight, and never was one dollar of this just indebtedness liquidated until the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], by refusing his vote to the passage of a bill similar to the one now before us, coerced those people into the payment of this honest debt.

Mr. President, commentary is unnecessary; criticism is useless. Here is the record; here are the facts. If they are brought into this discussion again the people of Dakota may thank their friends upon this floor who have made it necessary in order to meet the extravagant and ill-judged encomiums passed upon their law-abiding and conservative character.

It is said, however, and all the changes have been rung upon it, that the outrage of refusing Statehood to these people is unparalleled, gross, vindictive, and insulting. If we should listen to our distinguished friend from Indiana the children of Southern Dakota are crying for Statehood as they do at night for their mother's milk; the old men are praying for it; the young men are willing to fight for it; everywhere the spontaneous rising of the people and popular sentiment are visibly demanding from the representatives of the people the habiliments of Statehood inside the American Union. I know but one manifestation of this appeal and craving on the part of any community—it is their votes at the ballot-box, the silent and effective voice of freemen, more effective than the bayonets and bullets in deciding the destinies of a free people. Now let us look for an instant at the proof given by the election held in Dakota as to this craving and burning desire for the division of the Territory and the admission of Southern Dakota as a State.

Senators who feel any interest in this question would do well to look at the map of the Territory of Dakota and see the boundaries of this proposed new State, the area of country over which it extends. It is proposed to take all that portion of the Territory south of the forty-sixth parallel of latitude down to the line of Nebraska and constitute it into a State called the State of Dakota. In this proposed new State there are forty-nine organized counties, and on the west side of the Missouri River, in an area of country which embraces about one-half of the proposed new State, there are but five organized counties in all, known as the Black Hills counties, in the mining districts of the Territory.

Senators will observe what I say, because I desire now to put an end at once and forever to the assumption that the people of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel have demanded the passage of this bill, that there is an overwhelming public sentiment in its favor. I want to show that no such proposition should ever be successfully entertained before the Congress of the United States, which admits a State with one-half of its territory, I was about to say with no population at all, but absolutely with so sparse a population that I would be almost justified in using the expression I have named.

The Missouri River runs through this Territory from northwest to southeast, leaving about an equal portion of the Territory on either side of the banks of that river. In Southern Dakota, as I have said, out of the 77,000 square miles in the proposed State nearly 40,000 are west of the Missouri River, and in this area west of the Missouri River are five organized counties, with a population of 17,000 inhabitants. They claim that in the whole proposed area there are 263,000 inhabitants. All but 17,000 of the 263,000 are in the eastern half of this proposed State, and the election that was held only south of the forty-sixth parallel disfranchised one hundred and fifty-odd thousand people in North Dakota who were never consulted for a single instant in regard to taking away the name of the State or depriving them of the right of Statehood.

Only those persons were permitted to vote who lived south of the forty-sixth parallel, and in that area, as I have said, there are 263,000 inhabitants; and how many votes were cast? Under the ratio adopted in the census of the States there is held to be 1 voter to each 5 inhabitants; but we know that in the Territories in the far West it is safe to assume that 1 to 3, or, at any rate, 1 to 4 is the fair and legitimate ratio. How many voters were there, then, in this Territory south of the forty-sixth parallel? Divide 4 into 263,000 and there would be sixty-odd thousand voters at the lowest calculation. In a memorial presented by these gentlemen who claim Statehood they say there are 300,000 inhabitants in this area, and if that number were divided by 4 there would be 75,000 voters.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend will permit me to supplement that statement with the fact that the vote for Delegate to Congress in 1884 was 54,475.

Mr. VEST. In November, 1884, an election was held for Delegate in the southern half of Dakota. Mr. Gifford was the Republican candidate and Mr. Wilson the Democratic candidate. The vote cast then—and I have a list of the counties and the vote cast in each county—for both these candidates in this proposed new State was 57,407. That was in November, 1884. In November, 1885, the vote cast in the same counties for and against the constitution was 31,905, and of these 26,000, in round numbers, were cast for the constitution and the balance of the 31,000 were cast against it. From June to November the vote fell off nearly 50 per cent. It was 57,407 in an ordinary political contest between two men running for Delegate with a right to speak but not the right to vote in the House of Representatives. In November following, on the overwhelming issue of Statehood, for which the children were crying and old men praying, the vote fell from 57,000 to 31,900.

Why, Mr. President, if this overwhelming public sentiment exists there, if this is not a movement of politicians but a movement of the people, fire and flood and earthquake and pestilence and famine would never keep these hardy frontiersmen away from the polls. It might have kept the dudes and æsthetes of the cities away, but no man who is used to mountains and horses and riding a hundred miles a day would be prevented from putting in his vote. If this public sentiment existed, as the Senator from Indiana has been led to believe, why the falling off of this vote?

But that is not all. The ingenious and ambitious statesmen who got up this movement for their own political purposes were not satisfied to submit the naked question of Statehood or no Statehood, constitution or no constitution. They determined to put sugar upon the pill; they determined to bait, to use a Western parlance, the voters to bring them to the polls, and therefore they submitted at the same time with the constitution the question of what town in the proposed new State should be the seat of government; and we all know what that means; we all know what sort of vote that brings out in a county or in a State. These towns, as I shall show, sent to all the adjacent counties runners to bring in voters in order to obtain the capital for themselves.

Not only that; not satisfied with putting this question of the location of the capital in conjunction with the question of the constitution, these ingenious gentlemen also put the question of minority representation, in order to bring out the adherents and the non-adherents of that system to the polls.

But not only that; they determined to > Make assurance double sure,

> And take a bond of fate.

And they put in the question of questions which evokes the enthusiasm not only of the masculine but the feminine sex—enthusiasm which has filled the corridors of this Capitol to-day with a committee of ladies, which brings here each recurring session the question of prohibition, liquor or no liquor, sumptuary laws or no sumptuary laws; and if any question under Heaven would bring the people of the far West to the polls, it would be that identical question. Take away whisky from a Western man on the plains and you take from him not only the staff of life, but all that makes life endurable. [Laughter.]

In a trip to the Yellowstone some two years ago, in the valley of the Teton, at the foot of the grand Teton Mountain, in scenery not approximated by any on this continent, we found three men who had been there two years cut off from civilization, and who had not looked upon the face of a human being during that time. They came to our camp. They had not tasted bread for nearly two years; they had not had salt for more than eighteen months; their ammunition was running low, and the first thing they inquired for was not bread, not salt, but whisky. They were ready to trade anything in order to get whisky. I mention this to show not that these people were dissipated, but because the rigors of the climate, the necessities superinduced by climatic influences are such that alcoholic stimulants become a necessity in that climate.

This question of prohibition was added to the question of minority representation and of capital location, and they, together with Statehood, brought to the polls in November, before the rigors of the winter had fairly set in, of that hardy population 31,000 out of a voting strength of more than 60,000, and which in all probability amounted nearer to 75,000 than to 60,000. It is incredible, Mr. President, it is impossible that this overwhelming desire for division and Statehood should exist.

These facts are sufficient. I am furnished with a statement by gentlemen of veracity and intelligence, which I will read to the Senate in regard to this vote:

Counties south of the forty-sixth parallel.	Vote for Gifford and Wilson, Delegates to Congress.	Total vote on the constitution, for and against.	Counties south of the forty-sixth parallel.	Vote for Gifford and Wilson, Delegates to Congress.	Total vote on the constitution, for and against.

In the county of Beadle is situated the city of Huron, which was contesting for the location of the capital of the proposed State. The city of Pierre, in Hughes County, was a candidate for the capital. These two cities were the two prominent candidates for capital location, and their runners were sent into all parts of the southern portion of the Territory, and in the counties immediately adjoining, lying contiguous and between, the canvass was warm, spirited, and close. Notably among these counties should be named Buffalo, Potter, Hyde, Hand, Aurora, Jerauld, Faulk, Spink, and Kingsbury. The city of Sioux Falls, Minnehaha County, was also a candidate.

They sent their agents into nearly all the counties in the Territory embraced in the proposed State, and made an active canvass in the counties of Minnehaha, Moody, McCook, Lincoln, Turner, and Clay. Alexandria, located in Hanson County, was also a candidate for the capital, and their agents canvassed in the contiguous counties of Douglass, Charles Mix, Bon Homme, and Yankton. The fact of the spirited contest which was created by the various cities contesting for the capital location accounts for the vote in these counties named. In addition to the question of temporary location of the capital they enlisted the active support of the prohibition element in the Territory by submitting as a separate proposition the question of constitutional prohibition, and the arguments used were of such a character and made with the view of exciting a contest between the prohibitionists and the anti-prohibitionists, and thus swell the aggregate vote upon the constitution.

At the election held on the 30th of June, 1885, for the election of delegates to attend the constitutional convention, so little interest was taken in the movement that in many of the counties no election was held. Many of the commissioners of the different counties regarded the law of the Legislature calling the convention and making an appropriation therefor as unauthorized by the organic act of the Territory and void, and disregarded its provisions by refusing to put their counties to the expense of an unauthorized election, and in many of the counties where elections had been ordered by the board, at large numbers of the election precincts the polls were not opened. In the city of Milbank the polls were not opened until 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the day of the election, and then only after solicitation by telegrams from parties interested in the scheme. It the city of Redfield, a city of 2,000 inhabitants, but 48 votes were cast for the election of delegates. In the city of Yankton, which contains a voting population of over 1,000, but 143 votes were cast. In the city of Sioux Falls, the home of R. F. Pettigrew, who, with F. M. Washabaugh, the law partner of Judge Moody, one of the claimants of a seat in the United States Senate under this proceeding, engineered through the Legislature of the Territory the bill calling the convention at that city, there were cast less than 300 votes, and it is a city said to contain a population of over 6,000.

Instances and illustrations can be multiplied without number to substantiate the truth of this proposition. The people of Dakota have regarded this particular Statehood movement from its inception in the light of a farce, engineered by scheming politicians, with naught but political objects in view, and they have treated it as a fraud and a farce. It is safe to assert, without the fear of successful contradiction, that nineteen-twentieths of the people of Dakota who are there to build homes, identified with the agricultural and business interests of the Territory, have never encouraged or countenanced the action of the Republican leaders of that Territory in their efforts to seize the organization of the State of Dakota or to divide it for the purpose of multiplying official positions.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Missouri whether that paper is signed by any one? The Senator has not been speaking of his own knowledge.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to state the name.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to know the author of that paper, if it has an authorship.

Mr. VEST. The authors are Messrs. Boynton and Johnson, and another gentleman whose name I do not remember, but they are citizens of Dakota. In order to identify Mr. Boynton——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator need not do that. I have identified him already. I know him.

Mr. VEST. I should hope the Senator did know him, for I see here among the papers, though the Senator has not read it, a communication from Mr. Boynton to the honorable Senator from Indiana, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL HOTEL, Washington, D. C., January 2, 1886.

DEAR SIR: From statements recently published as coming from you or your committee, I infer that no papers are before the Territorial committee of the Senate in opposition to or protesting against the action of the last Legislature of Dakota Territory in appropriating the Territorial revenues, assessed upon all the counties in that Territory, for the expenses of a convention composed of delegates from only a portion of the counties, nor against the action of a convention held at Sioux Falls in the southeastern part of the Territory, and the assumption of power of a so-called State Legislature recently convened at Huron.

As an ex-Union soldier and for the past fifteen years a citizen of Southeastern Dakota, also in behalf of, as I believe, a majority of the legal voters south of the forty-sixth parallel in that Territory, I respectfully desire to lay before you and your committee a protest against any recognition by the United States Senate or House of Representatives of any of the acts above referred to or of persons claiming to represent the people of Dakota, or to hold office thereunder.

In support of this protest I inclose a copy of the unanimous protest and address of the regular Democratic Territorial committee, which was promulgated and published throughout the Territory previous to the election at which the so-called officials of the State government in the southern part of the Territory claim to have been elected. I also cite your committee to the fact that notwithstanding the submission of the exciting question of prohibition and the cunningly devised scheme of allowing all of the aspiring towns to compete by vote for the temporary location of the capital for the proposed new State, more than one half of the voters south of the forty-sixth parallel absolutely refused to recognize the so-called State movement by voting upon the questions presented therewith; also that of those who did vote upon these questions, more than six thousand voted against what they regarded as an illegal and revolutionary scheme to set up a State government in a portion of the public domain without the consent of the General Government. I desire to cite the further fact that no convention of delegates has ever been called or convened from all the organized counties in Dakota to determine the questions of division or admission upon which the unauthorized conventions at Sioux Falls or Huron have assumed to act. Nor has there been more than one-fourth of the votes of the whole Territory polled at any election in favor of division or immediate admission.

With these undeniable facts before your committee, I respectfully ask that you will report the inclosed bill, which has already been introduced in the House of Representatives, authorizing the people of Dakota Territory to bring before Congress in a legal and authoritative manner their wishes in regard to admission and Statehood. I also inclose a pamphlet containing exhaustive opinions and references, prepared by ex-Chief-Justice Peter C. Shannon, a Republican, who has filled the highest judicial office in the Territory for nine years, which I trust may assist some of the able lawyers, members of your committee of the same political faith, in dissecting the sophistries put forth by Hugh J. Campbell, the political leader of the Yankton, Sioux Falls, and Huron factions, now seeking to seize the political power incident to Statehood without authority of a majority of the legal voters in that portion of the Territory to be affected by the proposed change.

The attention of the Territorial Committees of Congress is also especially called to the extraordinary provisions in the Sioux Falls constitution, which provides that the judge for the Black Hills or mining district shall always be elected from the citizens residing within the limits of that judicial district, thereby placing it within the power of large mining combinations to vote their employés for judges who will be controlled by soulless foreign corporations.

The so-called State of Dakota is made one judicial district for United States cases, with all the terms of the district court to be held at Yankton, where all the records shall be kept, thus compelling attorneys, litigants, witnesses, and jurors to travel long distances to the extreme southern line of the proposed State, at an enormous expense of time and money, simply to appease the greed of the Yankton combination, which has largely controlled the South Dakota Statehood movement. A glance at the map will demonstrate the great outrage sought to be perpetrated in this cunningly devised plan to placate Yankton for the loss of the capital at a great waste of the public moneys and practically closing the United States courts to litigants of moderate means.

I assert that all the so-called State conventions have been gotten up and engineered by attorneys drawing large fees from powerful mining and railroad corporations, whose purpose is to give these attorneys seats in the United States Senate and House of Representatives, where they can be most useful in protecting these foreign corporations in other parts of the country. That many sincere and patriotic citizens have been swept into the South Dakota Statehood movement with the view of promoting the prohibition cause and other reforms is undoubtedly true.

The recent extraordinary attitude assumed by the so-called Legislature and State officials at Huron seems to have disgusted even the strongest advocates of division and admission, as the following quotation from the Yankton Press and Dakotian clearly demonstrates. It says in a recent issue:

"We have little faith in the efficacy of further efforts in behalf of division and Statehood. The whole effort has gone up in a puff of smoke."

This explicit admission from the oldest Republican newspaper in the Territory and the leading organ of the authorized division and Statehood movement ought to have great weight in favor of the bill which provides for a convention of delegates from all the counties in the Territory and enables the convention, when called, to bring before Congress in a lawful manner the deliberate judgment of the people of Dakota in regard to admission into the Union of States.

Very respectfully,

ABRAHAM BOYNTON,
Lennox, Lincoln County, Dak.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRISON,
Chairman of Committee on Territories,
United States Senate.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have no acquaintance with the gentleman who wrote that letter other than such as has been formed during the present session of Congress. The letter speaks for itself. It is certainly written with some ability, and if its statements be true, as I believe them to be, they are entitled to great weight, coming from a person who has lived fifteen years in that Territory.

Mr. HARRISON. Is the Senator aware of the fact that that gentleman was himself a member of the constitutional convention of 1883 that organized a State constitution for Dakota, and one of the most zealous promoters of a scheme to go right on with it?

Mr. VEST. That was 1883. I have known greater political changes than that in the same length of time by much more eminent gentlemen. He has given his reasons, and those reasons are before the Senate of the United States; and whatever his opinions were in 1883, if these are facts they should be entitled to some weight coming from a citizen of that Territory; and if he once favored this division and now is satisfied of the present movement that the people do not desire it and the figures show they do not desire it, he is right as an honest man in coming out and opposing it.

But the Senator from Indiana was pleased to observe the other day that the Democratic party even of that Territory were in favor of this movement. I say that the Democratic party as a party did not vote. You can find here and there sporadic cases like Judge Tripp and others who for reasons best known to themselves—I do not impugn their motives—favored this movement; but I say that the authorized exposition of the views of the Democratic party is in my hands and I ask the Secretary to read it, coming from the Territorial committee of the Democratic party of the Territory of Dakota.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

An address to the Democratic voters and people of Dakota.

At a meeting of the Democratic Territorial committee held this day at Mitchell, to consider the proper course to be taken by the Democratic party in the special election November 3, 1885, upon the question of the adoption or rejection of the constitution framed by the Sioux Falls convention, and for the election of officers for the proposed State of Dakota, it was decided by said committee, after consultation with numerous prominent Democrats from all sections of the Territory, then and there present, that the proper policy of the Democratic party is to take no action whatever, nor recognize at the polls in any manner, any of the propositions or provisions emanating from the said convention.

The committee arrived at this conclusion for the following among other reasons:

First. The entire proceedings from their inception in the Legislature down to the present time are revolutionary and antagonistic to the best interests of the people of Dakota.

Second. We deny the right of one part of the Territory to separate itself from the other without the express consent of the people of the whole.

Third. The attempt to force a recognition of a part of Dakota as a State and appropriating the name of the whole for a part is a proceeding unauthorized by law and a flagrant injustice to those of our citizens who are deprived of the privilege of being heard for or against the measure.

Fourth. The act passed by the last Legislature authorizing the convention at Sioux Falls, and appropriating $20,000 to defray the expenses thereof, was, in our judgment, unauthorized by the organic act of the Territory or any law of Congress, and therefore void.

Fifth. The fact that nine-tenths of the voters of the proposed State declined to join in the election of delegates to said constitutional convention indicates that the people are not in sympathy with the constitutional movement.

Sixth. We believe that the interests of the people of Dakota will be best subserved by awaiting the proper action of Congress in passing an enabling act authorizing the holding of a convention to frame a State constitution embracing such territory as the people—not the politicians—shall determine. We believe this action will be taken by the Congress soon to assemble.

We, therefore, as a committee, decline to call a Democratic convention for the nomination of officers for the proposed State, believing, as we do, that the whole proceeding will prove to be a gigantic farce, and recommend that the Democrats of Dakota and all law-abiding citizens generally decline to take any part whatever in the proceedings.

D. M. INMAN, Chairman.
W. H. BECKER, Secretary.

MITCHELL, DAK., October 15, 1885.

Mr. VEST. If it be said that this develops a partisan movement in opposition to this constitution, Senators on the other side are entitled and are welcome to the full force of the admission. I say that whether it was a partisan movement or not, it shows that the statement made by the Senator from Indiana is incorrect that the Democratic party as a party were in favor of this constitution, and his quotation of the position of Judge Tripp in order to enforce that position before the Senate loses force and consequence before the action of the accredited organ of the party in the Territory.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not undertaken, if the Senator from Missouri will allow the interruption, to say what the present attitude of the Democracy of the Territory of Dakota is upon this question. I did undertake to say, and I quoted the resolution, that before the Democrats elected their President, and when they considered this question from that standpoint, the Administration being in the hands of the Republican party, the Democratic Territorial convention had once, if not more than once, passed in their Territorial convention resolutions declaring in favor of a division upon the forty-sixth parallel.

Mr. VEST. Yes; I will come to conventions and legislatures directly, to the full satisfaction of any impartial auditor of this debate, but not to that of the Senator from Indiana. I will show what weight they are entitled to. I say now that the only accredited and the only authorized exposition of the will of the people is their suffrage at the polls. Every man here who has been in the Territories knows how conventions and legislatures are got up and organized. Any man who has had any observation and experience knows how easy it is by the ordinary trading process, especially in a large area of country where there are ambitious sets of politicians and rival cities and rival schemes for county seats and rival railroads, to bring about these spontaneous and unanimous votes on the part of conventions and of legislatures. Where are the votes of the people when they have the right and opportunity to vote? What becomes of 50 per cent. of the voters in South Dakota who were so anxious for Statehood that they rushed it through without awaiting the orderly conduct of this business on the part of Congress under the Constitution. What has become of those votes? Can the Senator answer?

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator say the vote fell off 100 per cent.?

Mr. VEST. I say that out of nearly 60,000 votes there were but 30,000 votes cast.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the Senator mean to say that the vote fell off 100 per cent.?

Mr. VEST. I did not mean to say that. I meant to say it had fallen off one-half—that out of each two voters one refused or declined or failed to go to the polls, and the returns show it. And as an additional inducement, besides prohibition, besides minority representation, besides the location of the capital, greed, avarice, money motives were appealed to. Here is the address issued by the Statehood committee to the people and voters of Dakota in order to bring them to the polls:

UNITED STATES APPROPRIATIONS FOR PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS AND INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS FOR A NEW STATE.

It has been the custom of Congress to appropriate for a new State upon admission 500,000 acres of the public lands for internal improvements; also 70 sections of land for the maintenance of a State university, 90 sections of land for the endowment and maintenance of an agricultural college, 50 sections of land for the building and maintenance of a penitentiary, and all the salt springs in the State not exceeding 12 sections. In addition to these donations it has been the custom of Congress, as a compensation to the new States for an exemption of the United States lands and property from taxation, to grant each of them 5 per cent. of the gross proceeds of all the sales of public land made within the limit of the State from the time of its organization as a Territory.

This sum for the State of Dakota will amount to, as we are informed by Hon. R. F. Pettigrew, from whom we have gathered these facts above stated, the sum of $1,500,000, being one-twentieth of the $30,000,000, the amount of the said sales up to this time.

If Dakota should be admitted as a whole, all these donations and grants but the last named would only be as much for the whole as for either of the two States separately. Therefore, it is easy to see that by division the people of the new State will gain twice the value in these grants which they would gain if admitted as a whole.

In other words, their avarice is appealed to. They are told, "Here divide the Territory, bring in South Dakota as a new State, and we get $1,500,000, the 5 per cent. fund on all the land sold and all the other vast tracts of land which Congress has been in the habit of donating to newly admitted States."

In regard to the question of area, it is urged that they are too large for a single State. There was a time, as I said a few minutes ago, when the only question in American statesmanship was how to populate and obtain new States for the Union. In numbers there was strength. Push out the frontier. That time no longer is upon us. The question with us is, shall we enter into this question of dividing up the Territory and admitting two States instead of one. There are already in the Union two States of a larger area than than this whole Territory. The whole area of the Territory is 149,100 square miles. Texas has 265,780 square miles, California has 158,360 square miles, Colorado 103,925. There are already then two States in the Union with a larger area than this whole Territory of Dakota if North and South Dakota should be admitted as one State.

I very well remember, and so does my friend from Indiana, for he urged it forcibly on the Senate session after session four years ago when this question was brought before us. The argument then was that there was a large area of uninhabited country between North and South Dakota, no connection by railroad; and therefore it was a positive hardship that both portions of this Territory should be brought in as one State. It was stated then that Middle Dakota had no population, that it was uninhabited, that the inhabitants of North Dakota, the citizens of Fargo in order to reach Yankton in Southern Dakota were compelled to go around 1,000 or 1,200 miles by rail. It was also stated that this was an alkali region that could not be used for agricultural purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not say that I said that?

Mr. VEST. I do not say that the Senator from Indiana did say it, but it was urged in some of the pamphlets, this argument was made then before the Committee on Territories that it would be years before Middle Dakota could ever be settled up, and it was a positive geographical hardship to contemplate the admission of the Territory as a whole. Now, what are the facts? Middle Dakota has become the most flourishing portion of the whole Territory agriculturally. It has been divided into counties. According to the Senator's own showing it has been cut up into farms, it blooms and blossoms to-day like the rose; one railroad running north and south has been completed, another almost completed, and several more in process of construction. It is a mere question of the near future when Northern and Southern Dakota will be bound together by bands of iron and steel, as they are bound together in interest.

As I have stated, the map shows that the Missouri River runs from the northwestern to the southeastern portion of this Territory. Now, Mr. President, the extraordinary fact is developed from the census taken and which is found in the report of the Senator from Indiana from the Committee on Territories that in this Territory east of the Missouri River are found some 388,000 inhabitants, while west of the Missouri River are found only some 25,000. In all this vast country, one-half of 149,000 square miles, west of the Missouri River are found only some 25,000 inhabitants, while the bulk of the inhabitants, out of a total population of 415,000 as shown by the census, 388,000 are found east of the Missouri River.

In the middle of Dakota the interior has been settled up, and counties have been organized in this eastern area. I read from the census itself. In the Territory of Dakota there are 415,664 inhabitants. This is divided as follows: In South Dakota there is a population of 262,515. The Senator in his report has it 263,000, but take it as one or the other, it matters not to the argument; I will take his own figures and say that in South Dakota there are 263,515. In North Dakota, north of the forty-sixth parallel of latitude, there are 153,149 inhabitants, not one of whom was allowed to express his sentiment or opinion in regard to the division of this Territory, and I shall show directly from the proceedings of a convention in North Dakota, if the Senator wants the proceedings of conventions, that it was without their consent, and they protest to-day and now against being robbed of the name of Dakota and against this bill being fastened upon them.

Divided on the Missouri River and the one hundred and first meridian, there are 389,959 inhabitants east of the Missouri River; there are west of the Missouri River 25,705; that is to say, in an area one-half of 149,000 square miles there are west of the Missouri River but 25,705 people, and west of the Missouri River and the one hundred and first meridian in South Dakota, in the proposed new State, 17,196 inhabitants. In the one-half of 77,000 square miles, out of 263,000 people as shown by the census in the whole of South Dakota, there are west of the Missouri River in all its immense area 17,196 inhabitants, and in North Dakota west of the Missouri River there are 8,509 inhabitants. Now in this portion of the Territory west of the Missouri River and south of the forty-sixth parallel are three-fourths of the great Sioux reservation of which Senators have been talking this morning.

The Black Hills are found in this western part of the Territory. I say it is bad policy for the United States to give up the control of these Indians and over that vast area of uninhabited country. If you want a State homogeneous in population and in interest, take that portion of the Territory east of the one hundred and first meridian, or running down to the Missouri River and then following the river a small distance on to the Nebraska line, cutting the Territory in half from north to south and putting the bulk of the population, nearly all of it, in a homogeneous, compact form east of the Missouri River. This would be something like a fair division of the Territory. This would certainly meet the desire of those people for Statehood and at the same time it would preserve the rights of the Government of the United States and the control of the United States over these Indian tribes and over these public lands. If a bill of that sort be introduced here, it will receive from me honest and fair consideration and approbation. I have no disposition to keep these people out of the Union if they are entitled to Statehood, but I do object to their dividing this Territory to suit a lot of politicians without regard to what I believe to be the honest will of the people, without regard to the area of the Territory, and without regard to the population as found. And I say if this question is divested of partisan considerations and the same argument and consideration applied to it as would be to any ordinary question presented for the consideration of Congress, there would not be a moment's hesitation in favor of the proposition I have made.

Mr. President, I have said before that in these counties in South Dakota west of the Missouri River, five organized counties only, known as the Black Hill counties, there are only 16,395 inhabitants; in the county of Butte, 1,081; in Custer, 1,292; in Fall River, 472; in Lawrence, 10,326; in Pennington, 3,224. In these five counties, the whole of this immense area west of the Missouri River in Southern Dakota, an area equal to all that portion of it east of the Missouri River, there were polled in November for the constitution 2,401 votes, and against it 612. In all this vast area there were polled altogether but 3,013 votes for and against.

I say, Mr. President, unhesitatingly that this vote shows that the people west of the Missouri River either did not vote at that election or that they were opposed to this whole project and scheme on the part of these gentlemen at Yankton. I will ask my friend from South Carolina to read an extract from a paper published at Deadwood, a Republican paper, in regard to that election and in regard to the results of the census.

Mr. BUTLER read as follows:

THE LESSON OF THE CENSUS.

It is not very pleasant to be compelled to admit sometimes that figures do not lie. But when the figures are our own it is even more disagreeable. This is the case with the figures of the last census, taken at our own instance, and mainly to show that Dakota in population was entitled to Statehood—that North and South Dakota each contained more people than the number required for admission. Unfortunately the figures prove too much for us of the Black Hills, for they sustain all that has been said by the advocates of division on the Missouri River and the one hundred and first meridian.

The census shows that Dakota has a population of 413,753, of which 388,094 are east of the Missouri River and but 25,659 are west of it. That tells the tale, and there is no escape from the conclusion. The vast region west of the Missouri, of which the Black Hills is a part, larger than the State of Illinois in area—separated from East Dakota by the longest river in the world—contains but 25,659 people. It has but three counties with a population of 2,000 or over. It has but six counties with a population of 1,000 or over. Seven of its counties included in the census contain less than 100 people each. But one of its counties (Lawrence), and that an unusually large one in area, contains 10,000 people. All the four Black Hills counties contain but 16,319 people. These are facts that the figures tell, and whatever may be said of other figures, we certainly are not in a position to say that our figures lie.

Dakota is too large for one State. All that has been said in favor of division, pure and simple, is true. Eastern Dakota would make a huge State—larger than Illinois. It contains 388,094 people, It has nearly one hundred organized counties, more than thirty of which contain each over five thousand people. It has almost no reservation land. It is settled up from Minnesota to the Missouri River—from the British boundary to the Nebraska line. East Dakota has every requisite, every claim, for immediate admission, and in common justice it should be admitted to the sisterhood of States at once. We wish as much could be said of Western Dakota. It is almost as large. It is in area greater than Kentucky, Indiana, or New Jersey. It is, roughly stated, about 400 miles north and south, by 200 miles east and west, but it contains only 25,659 people. The larger part of these are in the Black Hills counties and nearly 200 miles west of the Missouri River. More than half of its great area is yet Indian land, not owned by the Government and not open to settlement. Who can say when it will be?

To attach Western Dakota to Eastern Dakota merely for the purpose of getting into the Union would be, it must be confessed, wretched policy. Tennessee has tried for many years to get itself divided, but when once in the Union there is no changing the status of any portion of a State. If it gets in as the tail of a new, powerful section, it may wag, but that is all. It can never be much else than a tail, wag however much it may. This is the exact condition of Western New York, of Eastern Tennessee, of Western Pennsylvania, and many other rich and populous sections of great States. They help pay taxes and bear the burdens of Statehood, but are omitted in the distribution of the loaves and fishes. Eastern Dakota has already made such arrangements as to public institutions as would leave Western Dakota unprovided for during the next half century.

There are instances, we know, where the tail wags the dog, but when the dog weighs 388,084 and the tail but 25,659 the prospect is poor. The question arises whether it would not be better for the people who some day will occupy the great, thinly inhabited region between Wyoming and the Missouri River, to wait ten or more years for a State of their own than to creep in at the tail of another section which has twenty years the start.

There is much in the argument in favor of natural boundaries. The Missouri is one of the largest and most wonderful rivers of the world, navigable for all its entire course through Dakota, and having peculiar characteristics. It is as unique as the Danube, the Rhine, or the Nile. Nature seems to have intended it a boundary. There would have been as much reason in combining Kentucky and Indiana as Eastern and Western Dakota. Iowa and Illinois might as properly have been made one State as Eastern and Western Dakota. But all these States have great rivers inferior to the Missouri as their natural and legal boundaries.

Whatever is done about the division of Eastern Dakota into two States it is not apparent that the great region west of the Missouri is yet fit or ready for Statehood. It contains but 25,659 people scattered widely. It has few organized counties and no common interests with Eastern Dakota. Look at the map, recollecting the figures of the late census. Behold a region, more than half of which is yet owned and inhabited by the Indians, whose white population amounts to less than that of the Indians, and say what argument can possibly be adduced for tacking this on to Eastern Dakota.

The following are the figures of the late census in reference to Western Dakota:

Butte County	1,009
Custer County	1,284
Fall River County	472
Lawrence County	10,321
Pennington County	3,225
Morton County	5,873
Dunn County	32
Williams County	36
McKenzie County	24
Mercer County	254
Billings County	737
Stark County	1,507
Burdick County	95
Ewing County	47
Harding County	26
Mandan County	56
Sioux Reservation	653
Total population west of the Missouri River	25,659
Total population east of Missouri	388,094

Mr. VEST. I have had that article read, because it states distinctly, succinctly, and fairly the facts developed by the census. This bare statement shows that to give the control of this vast uninhabited area west of the Missouri River in Southern Dakota to the proposed State would be unwise. We ought to hold that in the Territorial condition. If Statehood is to come to these people, let it come to that portion of the Territory which has the population. The whole of this trouble has come from the fact that Yankton, in Southern Dakota, the political center of that portion of the Territory, and Fargo, in Northern Dakota, the political center of another junta of politicians as aspiring as those of Yankton, have inaugurated this scheme. There were not offices enough to go around, and their idea was to build two separate sets of public buildings without consulting Congress, and inaugurate a State in the south, appropriate the name Dakota, come here, and, with the ability, eloquence, and logic of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] and my friend from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], force Congress, under the plea that if denied it was denying to a portion of the people of the United States the ordinary rights of citizens.

It has been said by the Senator from Indiana that Northern Dakota favored this bill. I deny it. It is a most remarkable fact, and I put it to my friend from Indiana to answer why is it that in all this agitation for fifteen years for Statehood the people of this Territory have never been allowed to vote upon the question? Why is it that to-day we are appealed to in the name of the sovereignty and rights of the people, when never once have the people been permitted at the polls, the people of the whole Territory, to say whether they want the Territory divided or not?

I have here, received by yesterday's mail, the proceedings of a convention held in Northern Dakota, with a letter from the secretary, which I ask shall be read. It is sent to me officially with the resolutions of this convention held in Northern Dokota. I do not know any individual engaged in it. I take it from the tone of the letter that this gentleman, the secretary, and it is fair to presume that a large majority of the convention were not allied to me politically, were not Democrats; and it is right that this expression of popular opinion in that portion of the Territory should be placed before Congress, and, therefore, I ask that the letter be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ELLENDALE, DAK., ——, 188 .

SIR: I inclose herein copy of resolutions adopted by the late North Dakota convention. The resolutions are not intended to indorse the Harrison bill or division of the Territory, but recommend the change in case the Harrison bill is favorably considered by Congress. The majority of the people of Dakota are in favor of admission as a whole, but the politicians of Dakota make too much noise for the people. The voice of the latter is drowned out by those who want two sets of State officers. The Fargo convention was called by politicians with the intent to have that body declare in favor of division, but the people were too well represented, and so the best the politicians could do was to have the committee on admission and division effect a compromise and report to the convention recommending therein that all resolutions presented to the convention be laid on the table, and thus virtually end all discussion of the question. I send you copy of that committee's report, which was adopted. Afterward the inclosed resolution was adopted. A majority of the people or delegates were opposed to division, but the politicians, it must be confessed, outwitted the majority.

I know that there was a majority in that convention opposed to division, for the vote was well canvassed. A very large majority was in favor of division on the Missouri River, in case the Territory should be divided at all. I have taken the trouble to forward the inclosed resolutions to you for your consideration in case there is any likelihood of the Harrison bill becoming a law. The forty-sixth parallel, you are aware, is supposed to be north of the seventh standard. In the act passed by the last Dakota Legislative Assembly providing for a constitutional convention there was no provision for representation in any portion of the Territory north of the seventh standard, and that portion of the Territory between the two lines had no representation, nor did its people have any vote in the adoption of the constitution or in the election of State officers. Then by what right can we be made a part of a State proposed to be made by the Harrison bill. The Dakota politicians at Washington may lead you to infer that a majority of the people of Dakota are in favor of division, but you may depend upon it, in your noble fight on the floor of the Senate Chamber against division and admission of southern half as a State, the great majority of the people are with you. No political convention has said so, because the people were never truly represented.

Hoping that you will be successful in your opposition to the Harrison bill, and hoping also that you will, in case there is a likelihood of that bill becoming a law, remember the request contained in the within resolutions,

I remain, yours, very respectfully,

HENRY DICKIE.

Hon. GEORGE G. VEST, Washington, D. C.

NORTH DAKOTA CONVENTION.

ELLENDALE, DAK., Jan. 20, 1886.

To HON. GEORGE G. VEST,
Washington, D. C.:

I desire to call your attention to the following resolutions, which were adopted at the late North Dakota convention, convened at Fargo, Dak., January 12, 1886, namely:

"Without hereby deciding upon the merits of the Harrison bill, and without intending hereby to indorse the same,

"Be it resolved, That the said bill should not be passed through the present Congress of the United States without first incorporating therein the amendments proposed in the following resolutions, namely:

"Resolved, That the Harrison bill should not be passed through the present Congress of the United States without first incorporating therein an amendment changing the dividing line between South and North Dakota from the forty-sixth parallel to the seventh standard parallel east of the Missouri River and prolongation thereof from said river due west to the boundary of Dakota; the reason therefor being that division upon the forty-sixth parallel will divide counties, townships, school districts, and even farms, whereas the seventh standard parallel runs between organized counties only, and is but one to four miles distant from the forty-sixth parallel.

"Resolved, That this convention further declares its decided and emphatic opposition to the passage of said bill, or any other for the division of this Territory, that shall deprive this section of the name so dear to them as that of North Dakota."

The above preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted by the said North Dakota convention at its session of Thursday evening, January 14, 1886.

HENRY DICKIE,
Secretary of said Convention.

McLaren, chairman of the committee on division and admission, then made the following report:

"Your committee beg leave to make the following report:

"Resolved, That the citizens of the entire Territory of Dakota have aided in its upbuilding to its present position of prosperity, and to all citizens alike is that name endeared, and it is the sense of this convention that the name of Dakota should be given to no section of the present Territory to the exclusion of any other section.

"Resolved, That steps having been taken at the seat of Government at Washington looking to the immediate solving of all questions of the division of Dakota Territory and admission in whole or in part, with a view to avoid any embarrassment of our Delegates in Congress or of members of Congress having those questions under consideration, and to avoid in any way hampering them in their actions:

"Be it resolved, That this convention take no action whatever upon the question of admission and division, either or both, and formulate no further resolution thereon, either recommendatory or advisory.

"Resolved, That the resolutions heretofore referred to your committee be referred back to the convention with the recommendation that they be laid upon the table."

The report was adopted by a unanimous vote, amid cheers and laughter.

Mr. VEST. Now, Mr. President, I have two letters to present, one of them coming from one of the editors of the Black Hill Times, a Republican paper published at Deadwood in that portion of Southern Dakota which lies west of the Missouri River, and the other of these letters comes from Judge Granville G. Bennett, former Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Dakota, who occupied a seat upon the Territorial bench as one of the judges who sat in the decision of the bond case to which I referred. Both these gentlemen are Republicans, and it is right that this expression of opinion from persons, one of whom I know and the other of whom I am not acquainted with, but both unquestionably, from the tone and matter of their letters, intelligent men, should be presented.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

* * * * * * *

The people are opposed to them. How shown? By the positive refusal of the divisionists to submit their proposition to a vote of the people of the Territory. True, an "election" was held last November in a certain portion of the Territory upon the question of division, and that "certain portion" was so conducted by the schemers as to draw out the largest possible affirmative vote, while rivalry over capital location and other influences were adroitly manipulated for similar purpose. I have not the exact figures at hand, although I will hunt them up and send them to you; but to be safe, I can say that out of a total population in so-called "South Dakota" of 270,000 there was a total vote polled of 30,000. Of this tremendous (sic) vote of 30,000, 5,000 were of a negative character, leaving 25,000 as the entire strength of the division movement, much of which was fictitious, because many a vote was polled through "capital" considerations alone, and by persons at heart opposed to division.

Please do not forget the fact that anti-divisionists did not vote, did not recognize the movement in the least; refused to dignify it by opposing it, or even noticing it other than to laugh at it; while it is just as certain that the entire strength of the divisionists was made to appear, and to this end old returning-board Campbell thoroughly organized his canvassing machinery on the Louisiana plan. While considering this particular election, the fact must not be overlooked that a large portion of Dakota was ostracised. As will be seen by the last report of Governor Pierce to the Secretary of the Interior, "the recent census, taken under the laws of Congress, and with all the safeguards against fraud which any Federal census possesses, shows a population in round numbers of 416,000." No one but a demagogue will pretend to say that each and every citizen in each and every part of the Territory should not enjoy the same rights and privileges that are vouchsafed to you, myself, or any other individual; yet Moody and his merry men would say, and did say, to the 146,000 people of North Dakota: "Stand aloof while we disinherit you, while we rob you of your good name, of your possessions, of your prospects of assuming the honors, dignity, and prerogatives of full-fledged American citizens. We propose to divide this Territory; to secure Statehood for the southern half, and offices for ourselves. We know that the remaining northern portion will not be eligible to Statehood for years, but we care not; it is the will of Moody, Campbell, et al., and that is sufficient." Practically, such was the proceeding; hence the nation beholds the pretense now made that the twenty-odd thousand votes polled or manufactured later on represent the 416,000 people living within the Territory. I say, and I insist, if Congress will give the people an opportunity to declare in this matter, that it will clearly appear that the effort of Moody and clique is nothing less that an attempt at political grand larceny; that it will appear that while twenty-odd thousand people are in favor of division, over 200,000 are opposed to it.

In 1884 Dakota polled a total vote of 86,723 for Delegate to Congress, of which Gifford (Republican) received 71,599 and Wilson (Democrat) 15,124. We know that the latter strength is solidly opposed to division. I know and assure you, and assurance is obtainable from many sources, that a very large majority of Republicans are opposed also. This is no party question here; in fact, it is not discussed or considered from a political (factional) standpoint. I am a life-long Republican, proud of my party and proud of its achievements, and I assure you that my convictions and aspirations are common with the party throughout Dakota. You doubtless remember Judge Granville G. Bennett, formerly Delegate to Congress. He is as emphatically anti-division as myself. Ask for his views? You witnessed the confirmation of William E. Church, associate justice of the supreme court of this territory and presiding judge of this district. He is as pronounced in opposition as myself. These are representative men with whom you are acquainted, by reputation at least, and who stand with the highest in this Territory. Their views mean something. What is it? That the heresy advocated by Moody, Edgerton, and others is exactly what I term it—a heresy preached abroad for damnable purposes; that division is neither desirable nor advisable; that the scheme evolved by Campbell and Moody is advanced for an ulterior and an outrageous purpose.

I could enumerate hundreds of others, prominent in the Territory but unknown abroad, all of the one mind and having the one desire, but such reference is unnecessary. Give us an opportunity to vote, give the people of the Territory (not those of any particular county or counties ambitious for capital honors) a chance to declare their desires, and you, Congress, and the country will understand exactly what we want.

I have written in haste and at undue length, but, my dear sir, I cherish intense feeling in this matter; and so do the people at large. Usurpers are abroad. Animated lies will strut through the halls of Congress and peer over the gallery-rail this week. You will be told that "the people want division, are crying for division, are willing to die for division." At that particular juncture, Senator, look the fellow squarely in the eye (if you can "catch it") and casually ask him to prove it; ask him, further, if he is not falsifying; ask him if he does not know that he lies—that is the kind of good old-fashioned vigorous English we use in this country—and if he does not quail before you like the craven that he is, believe me false and my protestations a pretense and a fraud.

Mr. LOGAN and others. Name. Who signs it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There seems to be no name.

Mr. HARRISON. It seems to be of the No-Name Series.

Mr. VEST. The gentleman who writes that authorized me to use his name. Does the Senator from Indiana want it?

Mr. HARRISON. We had better have it.

Mr. VEST. The Senator shall have it. This is the man, L. S. Whitbeck, connected with the Black Hills Times, a Republican paper published at Deadwood, Dak. If any other bill of particulars is needed I will furnish it.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no objection to giving the name.

Mr. VEST. None at all except for the comments on it, as if I wished to retain the name for some ulterior purpose. I had that letter copied by my secretary, and he failed to put the name to it. I present nothing here that I want to suppress. Now I ask that the other letter be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEADWOOD, DAK., January 4, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Whitbeck, of this place, has just shown me a letter addressed by him to you on the matter of the division of our Territory and admission of the southern portion as a State under the so-called Sioux Falls constitution, in which I am mentioned as an opponent of the movement. This reference seems to justify on my part a brief statement of my views. It would be strange indeed if a Territory containing the population of Dakota, sufficient to entitle it to three members of the lower House on the present basis of apportionment, should not with great unanimity desire Statehood, with all the advantages it brings.

Our population is not of a floating and unstable character, but permanent, here to stay, and you and others need have no fears of a re-enactment of the Nevada political farce. I think, and you must agree with me, that we are clearly entitled to admission, and that at the earliest day possible, and we hope and trust Congress will initiate the movement without hesitation or delay.

There was a time when division was considered advisable and desirable; when its settlements were confined in its northern portion to the Red River Valley and along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad and in the Missouri Valley and its tributaries in the south, with a wide stretch of country lying between unsettled and untraversed, with no direct means or channels of intercourse or intercommunication; when to reach one section from the other a long detour had to be made round through Iowa and Minnesota or via Missouri River, the navigation of which has always been slow and uncertain and closed for at least five months in the year.

During the period of this isolation the two sections seemed to have nothing in common; their lines of communication were different, their markets divergent, and but few interests, social, commercial, or political, in common. But within the past few years these conditions have been entirely changed. The phenomenal settlement and development of the Territory, the rapid construction of numerous lines of railroads, the intermingling of the people, and the convergence of interests as a whole have had a cementing and solidifying tendency, so that the people feel to-day that they are the common inheritors of one grand inheritance, bound together in one fortune and one future. Central Dakota has been occupied, covered with farms, villages, cities, railroads, churches, and school-houses, and all the concomitants of wealth and civilization, and there is no longer any "waste places" or unproductive or untrodden solitudes separating our settlements north and south, and a line of division on the forty-sixth degree of north latitude bisecting such a country at this time must be purely arbitrary, without any natural, political, or commercial causes to justify it.

In a very short time, with our rapid progress in the construction of railroads and telegraph lines, every point in our Territory will be easily accessible from every other point, and time and distance will be annihilated so far as business and the convenience of travel are concerned. So that the reasons for division, once weighty, no longer exist. I am quite well aware of the arguments advanced in support of the present State movement, the chief of which is that our Territory is too large to be embraced within the limits of one State. But when we ask why there is no satisfactory answer. We find two States much larger and many much smaller, so there is no geographical limitation fixed either by law or custom. We are assured that the large States would not part with any of their territory, and the smaller are not clamoring to be enlarged.

True, if divided, we would ultimately have four United States Senators in place of two. That perhaps appeals more strongly to the few who have Senatorial aspirations than to the masses on whom fall the burdens of two State governments.

Representation should be apportioned according to population if possible, but under our present system that never can be in the United States Senate. If it could, while Rhode Island and Delaware have each two Senators, how many would the great States of New York and Pennsylvania be entitled to? Dakota has already a larger population than at least any one of eight States which are represented in that body, but if admitted with its present boundaries it could not be expected to overtake at least a dozen States that might be named in the next half century. It is the people who are represented, not degrees of latitude and longitude.

What effect the admission of Dakota may have on the present dominant political parties in their struggle for power should not be seriously considered. We are laying the foundations of a great Commonwealth which we trust will outlive all present political issues and contests, and certainly the vaulting ambition of a few eager place-hunters. I am satisfied that the great mass of the people do not want, or care very little about, division. Many in the southern portion would favor it if satisfied that it was the shortest and most certain road to Statehood, as I should certainly do; but we feel that its constant agitation has retarded rather than promoted that desired end and object.

The present movement for Statehood had its inception in the last Territorial Legislative Assembly. It was not an issue, was not even referred to during the campaign preceding the election of the members of that body, and called for and incurred the expenditure of a large sum of money which with the subsequent proceedings never had the approval and sanction of the will and wish of the people. Scarcely a year previous the same self-constituted leaders had called a constitutional convention, adopted what they were pleased to term a constitution and submitted to a vote, but that vote was so small, and the whole venture fell so flat that it was thought best to renew the project and surround it with a sort of halo of pretended legal authority. But the effect on the minds of the people was about the same as the first demonstration.

The people of this portion of the Territory I know are opposed to the whole proceeding, but no opposition was organized against it or effort made to defeat it in the Hills counties, except here in Deadwood, the home of one of the newly elected United States Senators, one of the judges of the so-called State supreme court, and their lieutenant-governor, and here it was buried under an adverse majority of over 4 to 1. And such would have been its fate throughout the Black Hills and in many other localities if the same fight had been made; but the whole thing simply went by default.

The masses can see no good reason why the whole Territory can not be as honestly, judiciously, and economically governed under one State organization, with but little more than half the expense, as under two with the expenditures duplicated. Regarding the whole movement for South Dakota as one that would fall still-born, its opponents were satisfied with ridiculing it and staid away from the polls, and refrained from any participation in it. The side issues that were submitted with the so-called constitution to a vote of a fraction swelled that vote to at least double what it would otherwise have been. I refer to the question of the location of the temporary seat of government, for which there were several aspirants, the prohibition clause, the minority representation provision, &c., all adroitly made to figure in swelling the factitious vote.

What the people want is an enabling act for a convention that will frame a Constitution for the entire Territory for a State with our present boundaries, to be submitted to a vote of all the qualified electors. That will present squarely the issue whether division is wanted or not, an issue on which the voice of the people has as yet never been taken, and with a verdict so rendered, Dakota will be satisfied, and I think Congress should be. I do not hesitate to say that the present movement does not represent the people either in its inception or the final scene enacted by a so-called "State Legislature," and, as such, is not entitled to any serious consideration at the hands of Congress. It does not even deserve to be dignified as revolutionary, for it is no movement "from the people, by the people, or for the people," and they should not suffer in their loyal reputation and devotion to our great and grand national sovereignty.

Pardon the length of this letter. I can only plead my interest as a private citizen in justification.

Very respectfully,

GRANVILLE G. BENNETT.

Hon. GEORGE G. VEST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, my connection with this debate is almost over. In the report of the chairman of the Committee on Territories there is sought to be instituted a parallel between the vote of Southern Dakota on the adoption of this constitution and the votes upon the constitutions of other States under similar circumstances when they applied for admission into the Union. That argument would be more forcible and more legitimate if the chairman of the Committee on Territories had also given us information of the populations of the States in which the votes were respectively cast. The vote is highly significant and useful as showing the sentiment of the people. That sentiment is not conclusive upon Congress, but as representing the people it has force as a matter of course with those of us, and all of us I presume, who desire to meet the wishes of the people if we believe that those wishes can be carried out without injury to the other States of the Union. When Missouri, Illinois, and other States are cited by the Senator from Indiana in his report why does he not give us the aggregate population to show whether the people came to the polls?

Mr. HARRISON. I did not pretend to give in the report any votes at all on that subject.

Mr. VEST. Then it is in the remarks of the Senator and in the pamphlet which contains the address to the people of the Territory.

Mr. HARRISON. Possibly it is; but nothing of that kind is in the report.

Mr. VEST. Then I withdraw the statement that it was made by the Senator. It is made in this pamphlet, and it has appeared here in the history of this discussion.

Mr. HARRISON. I said in my remarks that I did not believe the Senator could find any case where a State constitution had been submitted in the first instance to the people where a larger vote was cast or a larger percentage of the vote was cast, and I adhere to that statement on the information I have now.

Mr. VEST. That, then, is the point. That is the identical issue. If the Senator would give us the aggregate population of the Territories where those votes were cast, we could then arrive at the justness or ortherwise of the assertion. Here we have the vote of Dakota, we have the population of Dakota, and we see the result at the polls.

Mr. HARRISON. I will give the Senator one now, if he desires to pause, that I have a memorandum of. He will find, if he undertakes to look through the records to get at the vote and population at the time the States were admitted, that he will have very great difficulty. I have Iowa before me, when her people voted for a constitutional convention, in 1844. The vote for the constitution was 7,191; against it 4,310; the total vote 11,501, and a majority of 2,881, and the census submitted in connection with that showed a population of 79,000, not out of proportion, I think, here.

Mr. VEST. That depends upon the ratio establishsd between the voters and the inhabitants.

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose the same ratio would prevail in both cases.

Mr. VEST. Without making any calculation, I do not think it presents a parallel instance of voters to population as in Dakota. There were 79,000 inhabitants, as I understand the Senator. That would make 15,000 voters at the ratio of five inhabitants to each voter.

Mr. HARRISON. The population of South Dakota is more than three times what that of Iowa was then, 79,000. That would only be 237,000. The population of South Dakota is 263,000; and yet the vote cast on the constitution was within a very small fraction of three times as many as the vote cast in the case of Iowa.

Mr. VEST. At any rate, under any sort of computation, whether you establish the ratio at 5 or 4 to 1, one-half the people in Southern Dakota abstained from voting at the polls when there was such an overwhelming sentiment for Statehood as has been alleged here by Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

Now, Mr. President, I come to one significant fact; I have heard no explanation of it, and yet it seems to be a salient point in the discussion of the Senators who advocate the passage of this bill. It was considered so important as to be specifically noted by the Senator from Indiana in his report, and it was urged again in his remarks on the floor of the Senate. He quotes from a memorial adopted in Dakota and sent to the Forty-eighth Congress in which they use the following language:

> And, although the people of all Dakota are earnestly in favor of admission of the southern half as a State, still they will hail with joy division only, and if asking for admission of the southern half as a State will in any manner delay division, then we earnestly request division, without the admission prayed for, at the earliest possible time.

What is the irresistible conclusion from that statement? Does it not show that it is not Statehood which these people really want, that Statehood is an inferior consideration, that instead of panting for Statehood as the hart panteth for the water brook they want division, and they say here emphatically they are willing to remain a Territory if you will only divide them. It is significant as establishing in my mind beyond any question that this whole thing originated with these ambitious politicians north and south. They want to be separated from each other. They do not want to be brought into antagonism with each other in the race for office. "Give us division and keep us out of the Union. We would rather stay out forever than to be brought together." When the population of the eastern half of this Territory to-day is homogeneous, when they are bound together by railroads, when circumstances no longer exist, as they did four years ago when it was urged on us that interior Dakota could not be settled, they still clamor for division.

But the great argument as showing the will of the people is that the Legislatures have been unanimous for division. I have already alluded to the manner in which these Legislatures are generally composed. The last Legislature in Dakota, judging from the Republican press, was itself without a parallel for scheming and jobbing in the legislative history of this country. I have here before me now extracts taken from the papers of the Territory, and embodied in a letter to the Chicago Times in April last, a paper which has never failed to publish every item from Dakota personally and politically abusive of myself and of every Senator who has resisted the passage of this legislation. I do not know the gentleman who wrote this article. He writes from Huron, in Dakota. He wrote it in April last. I ask that it be read as a graphic picture of the Legislature from which emanated this present Southern Dakota movement in order to show what sort of an exponent it is of public sentiment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A BLIZZARD FROM DAKOTA.

HURON, DAK., April 5.

To the Editor:

Nobody believed when last winter Senator VEST plainly intimated the possibility that Dakota might before many years be made Democratic that this was anything more than political vaporing. How could such a thing be? The Democratic candidate for Delegate had been defeated by 80,000 but two months before. He received but 1 vote in 7. He did not carry a single county, and in some counties got not a single vote. How could Dakota ever become Democratic? The fact is that if political matters continue to progress as they have for months past Dakota will be decidedly Democratic before the end of Cleveland's term. Senator VEST's wish and boast will be more than realized. All that is necessary for the Democratic party to do to effect this is to let Dakota severely alone. The Republican statesmen that are now making the country resound with their frantic yells for admission are doing the business more effectually than any Democratic management could do it.

The candidacy of the aspiring young man who ran for delegate on the Democratic ticket meant nothing. He represented nobody but himself and excited no interest, had no following, little political experience, and less tact. He simply advertised himself, as many men seek to do when there is little or no competition for the leadership in a hopeless race, and when the notoriety, possible patronage, and glory are deemed ample compensation for a few speeches. The Democratic vote was no index of the Democratic strength in Dakota. An able speaker of reputation might have polled a respectable vote, but even then it would have been no evidence of the real state of parties in Dakota.

The Legislature has just adjourned, and from the Republican press of the Territory comes up a universal howl of execration. These are the same papers which not four months ago abused Senator VEST without stint for daring to hint that Dakota might become Democratic by the time she is fit to become a State. One of these says elegantly that the last Legislature "takes the cake" for imbecility and jobbery on local and private matters. Another says "Dakota's greatest misfortune is in her prominent statesmen." It declares that "the action of our Legislature has vindicated those who have opposed our promotion." "Told you so," says VEST. Another declares that "Dakota can feel proud that the

to do harm has expired." One paper affirms that "the sickest lot of sorehead political tricksters that ever congregated together was in the Dakota Legislature." The Fargo Republican says that the Legislature was "the most dangerous in the history of Dakota," and that "the people feel safe now that it has passed out of existence." A convention of pickpockets, thimble-riggers, and tricksters could not have evoked from the Republican press more violent denunciation than has the Legislature which has just adjourned.

Now these are the facts which the Republican press almost without exception loudly assert. Is it visionary, then, to say that Dakota is on the road to Democracy? There is one huge nausea all over the Territory. From the Bad Lands to Devil's Lake, from the Black Hills to Manitoba, men are holding their noses until the blizzards purify the atmosphere. Now if Dakota was a State, its legislative enactments subject to no restrainst, its governor chosen from these "eminent statesmen," how much of the Territory would be left to administer on in four years?

A greater humbug than this cry by the Territorial politicians of both parties, "Give us our officers from our own people," never was invented. Its dishonesty is transparent. Alaska might as well demand that her officers should be selected from her own people as Dakota, or Idaho, or Arizona. The truth is the material is lacking in all Territories for competent and trustworthy officers. It was in the old days when General Harrison and such men were made governors of Territories, and it is to-day. The last Legislature has shown that it would have been well if its members had been appointed by some outside and impartial agency instead of by banks, railways, rings, and monopolies that already are seeking by all the vile old ways to fasten their talons on the fair land of Dakota.

A corporation with a little money can already buy almost anything it wants in Dakota—legislation, law-makers, and law officers. The established rate of interest is 12 per cent. In a few counties of the Black Hills any rate may be contracted for by special law. Banks get from 2 to 5 per cent. per month, and are as merciless as Shylock in demanding their pound of flesh. They will have their "usance," blood or no blood. God help the poor miner or ranchman who falls into their clutches. The Legislature which has just adjourned had among its members the agents of these money-sharks, and no effort was made to relieve the suffering people.

Senator VEST last winter referred to the numerous local wars over county seats as an evidence that Dakota was not yet fit for Statehood. If he had lived in Dakota a few years he would have had a thousand better arguments. The devil seems to have been let loose in this Territory and is trying his 'prentice hand on Dakota before venturing on that thousand-year raid with which the earth is threatened. You can not find a county, or township, or village, in which there is not a row raging now over county seat, over town sites, over county divisions, over the location of the land offices in districts, then over their location in the towns. Even the building of a skating rink is sufficient to call out the village wranglers. Everybody wants to move everything, and he wants it on his corner lot. They want to move the capital, the capitol building, the courts, land offices, and post-offices. All the wranglers and ringsters in the country seem to have collected in Dakota, and the very genius of discord is let loose. As soon as you arrive in any village you are expected to take sides. If you do not take sides, then all sides take you. Let any one travel throughout Dakota and he will be convinced beyond cavil that it is as yet unfit for Statehood. It has more statesmen to the square mile than the District of Columbia had on inauguration day, though there is not a man in it as yet known in one-third of its counties. It is an immense Territory, as yet sparsely settled, its population and business centers not fixed, nothing homogeneous about it; everything chaotic, or rather embryotic; and yet all over it are little wriggling knots of small politicians, squirming ceaselessly to get into places they would never have dared to aspire to in the States they came from.

The conclusion from all this is that it has been for the people now in the country and those coming—for Dakota and the country—a most fortunate circumstance that these politicians have thus far gone unheeded, and that none of them have been able to disgrace the Territory and country on a larger field than that they now occupy. Until the last Legislature is forgotten let Dakota keep quiet.

Mr. VEST. Now, Mr. President, I have but a few words to say in conclusion. I think one fact is evident. It may be admitted by Republicans and Democrats without any injustice to our party fealty or to our duty as Senators. It is manifest beyond a scintilla of doubt that a vast difference of opinion exists in this Territory in regard to the manner of division and the propriety of division at all. It is shown by themselves that one-half of this immense Territory is virtually without population, that all of that portion of it west of the Missouri River, equal in area to that portion east, has but 25,000 white inhabitants and that the portion of Southern Dakota which is proposed to be incorporated into the State of Dakota has but 17,000 white inhabitants, and that in this vast area west of the Missouri River are contained this large Sioux reservation and other Indian reservations, and an immense extent of public land. Is it not best, is it not safest and wisest, to commit this question to the people themselves and let them vote upon it? Why should we take the indirect testimony of legislatures and conventions in a sparsely settled Territory in the far West as conclusive of this matter, especially in the face of the unanimous testimony almost of the Republican papers from all portions of the Territory that the Legislature originating this present movement disgraced legislation everywhere.

Sir, at the proper time I shall submit, after the vote has been had upon the substitute of the Senator from South Carolina, a proposition to divide this Territory from north to south upon the one hundred and first meridian of longitude. That will give to the State of Dakota, if Congress sees proper so to designate it, east of the Missouri River a population of 400,000 inhabitants, and will leave this vast area of country almost totally unpopulated west of the Missouri River still in its territorial condition subject to the forming and fashioning hand and legislative wisdom of Congress in the future.

Mr. LOGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois being entitled to the floor on the pending bill, the Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 29, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GROSVENOR, indefinitely, by reason of important private business.

To Mr. TOWNSHEND, for two weeks, on account of important business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF A BILL.

The SPEAKER. On the 6th of the present month House bill No. 2340, a bill directing the Quartermaster-General to settle with the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, and for other purposes, was introduced and referred to the Committee on Claims. It should have been referred to the Committee on War Claims; and if there be no objection the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. BEACH. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the regular order is equivalent to an objection. This being Friday, the regular order is the call of committees for reports on bills of a private nature.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF BILLS.

Mr. DOCKERY, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back bills of the following titles; which were severally read, and referred to the Committee on Claims, namely:

A bill (H. R. 3670) for the relief of M. C. Mordecai; and

A bill (H. R. 3176) for the relief of the American Grocer Association of the city of New York.

GEORGE W. MORSE.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Patents, reported back the bill (H. R. 959) for the relief of George W. Morse; which bill was referred to the Committee on Claims.

JAMES PRICE.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. 2935) for the relief of James Price; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOEL C. FRAZIER.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 898) for the relief of the estate of Joel C. Frazier, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF BILLS.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back bills of the following titles; which were severally read, and referred to the Committee on Claims, namely:

A bill (H. R. 2053) for the relief of Rachael J. Floyd; and

A bill (H. R. 633) for the relief of Maj. G. W. Candee.

CONFIRMATION OF LAND TITLES, ARIZONA.

Mr. ELDREDGE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. 3235) to confirm title to certain private land claims in Arizona Territory; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The call of committees was concluded.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Agriculture a bill, which is not in order under this call, for reference.

Mr. BEACH. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. There is objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri. As the rule of the House does not permit committees to call up during the second morning hour any bill of a private nature, there is of necessity no such morning hour on Friday, this day being dedicated solely to the consideration of private business.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Speaker, I have been assuming that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] would make a motion that the House should proceed to consider the Private Calendar, but as the gentleman is not present I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would like to ask if it is not in order to bring up the pension bill, that is pending, on a question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. What bill does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, for the increase of pensions to widows.

The SPEAKER. But that is not a private bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know; but is it not in order to raise the question of consideration, so as to reach the consideration of that bill to-day?

The SPEAKER. Under the rule of the House, Friday is set apart exclusively for the consideration of private business.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am aware of that; but is it not in order to antagonize the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio to go into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; any gentleman can vote against it. That is the only way to antagonize the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The motion of Mr. GEDDES was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

The Clerk read the title of the first bill on the Private Calendar (reported by Mr. GEDDES from the Committee on War Claims), as follows:

A bill (H. R. 989) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, with amendments.

Mr. GEDDES. The bill (H. R. 989), the title of which has just been read, embraces claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, and which have been reported on by the Committee on War Claims in bulk. They are investigated, reported to the House, and by the committee acted on, under the act of July 4, 1864. To some the law under which these investigations are had may not be familiar, and the practice heretofore adopted by the House may not be well known; and I will make a very brief statement in order that all may understand the matter.

The Committee on War Claims, to which are referred from time to time these cases reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, have not felt any very high degree of responsibility in their investigation. The act alluded to of July 4, 1864, is of the character and in the nature of a provision such as nearly every member of the House has felt not only the importance of but the absolute necessity for in order to a proper investigation of this class of claims. Only a certain class of cases, however, were embraced in that law and were investigated by the Quartermaster-General of the United States and the Commissary-General of Subsistence. By that law an annual report is made to Congress, and by its terms we are supposed to consider those cases. But it may be entirely proper to say that in the committee heretofore it has not been the practice to examine in detail all these claims; and the House will readily appreciate the utter impracticability of it; and that very impracticability led to this law under which those cases are investigated. This bill, coming to us under this law, embraces nine hundred and forty-three claims, aggregating in amount $228,578.36. They are in the interest of eleven States and one Territory. I may say, however, they come mainly from the States of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri. The largest number of them are from those States; fewer come from the other States—West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, and other States.

The Committee on War Claims of the last Congress felt it their duty to go somewhat into detail in regard to these cases. By former committees bills had been reported to the House based on the utter impracticability of an investigation of the correctness of the findings of the Quartermaster-General. Still we felt that we might classify the claims, that we might select out a few of each class, and that we might take a number of the larger claims from each of the States named and go through them; and if, on an investigation of those cases, we found accuracy and care and ability displayed we might pass judgment upon the balance.

In that manner the Committee on War Claims of the last Congress waded through these cases. I am not able from memory to say how many out of nine hundred were actually opened up and the papers and proofs relating to them investigated; but I am able to say a large number of the cases involving a large amount were thus examined by the committee, and the result of that investigation I am at liberty to state. Of that number seven only were, in the judgment of the committee, to be excluded from the bill, and these were left out of the report made to the last Congress.

As that bill did not pass the House for want of time and was upon the hands of the War Claims Committee of the present Congress, it becomes necessary to consider these cases again; but upon a suggestion made in committee these cases were not reinvestigated by the present committee. Still, the exclusion of the seven cases to which I have referred was acquiesced in by the committee with this understanding, which I ought to state: that in order to secure early action upon this bill, and that it might not be delayed, it was understood that the committee was not concluded by the exclusion of those seven cases from this bill, but that the judgment of the committee might be appealed to on another investigation in the next collection of cases that will be sent to us from the Treasury Department.

The amount allowed by the committee is $221,140.36, excluding claims reported to us to the amount of $7,106. I presume it will not be necessary for me to state the grounds upon which these claims were excluded. They are not reported in this bill. And I presume, further, that it will not be expected that we can go over in detail nine hundred and forty-three cases less seven embraced in this bill without doing injustice to the other business before the committee, in regard to which a different responsibility has been imposed.

By the act of July 4, 1864, under which this investigation is made from time to time by the departments mentioned, it will be borne in mind that they are only given jurisdiction of a certain class of cases—claims of loyal citizens, whose loyalty must be established, and claims originating in States not in rebellion. In all the cases reported to us from time to time strict proof has always been required, so far as I have observed, first of loyalty, then that the property was taken for the benefit of the Army, and actually appropriated and used for the Army in States not in rebellion. Tennessee was originally in rebellion, but it was relieved by an act subsequent to the act to which I have referred; so that the claims of Tennessee can now be considered under that act and amendments thereto subsequently made.

Originally only two counties of West Virginia were embraced by the first amendment made to this law in 1864, but subsequently all West Virginia was allowed to present claims of the class to which I have referred. By that same law a limitation was attached, so that this class of claims can no longer be submitted to the Departments. They were barred on the 1st of January, 1880, and the cases that are now being sent to us are only cases that were filed prior to that date and that are now being investigated from time to time. Cases filed since January 1, 1880, are not taken jurisdiction of by these Departments, or by them considered; so we can all see that at an early day those claims will be exhausted which do not come within the statute of limitation. I need only emphasize one consideration more, I think, to have all understand that the committee do not anticipate any resistance to the claims we have presented here, and that is this:

We have all heard from time to time during the present session that, as a judicial tribunal, this House, even with its committees, is to some extent disqualified, incompetent, not properly organized for the consideration of these cases and questions. The cases that come before our committee outside of this class are based upon ex parte affidavits of a most uncertain, unsafe, and unreliable character, whereas these cases are investigated by agents sent by the Quartermaster to the locality where the claims originated. Testimony is there carefully taken and reduced to writing, a report is made by the subagent to the Quartermaster-General, the cases are reinvestigated by him, he reports them to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, and there they are again carefully and judicially reviewed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] will permit me to interrupt him, I will ask him to state the aggregate amount of the claims embraced in this bill.

Mr. GEDDES. The aggregate is $228,578.36. As I have stated early in my remarks, the committee have excluded claims to the amount of $7,106, leaving $221,472.36 as the total of the claims on which action is now asked.

Mr. LONG. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GEDDES. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. Has the committee examined fully any one of these cases?

Mr. GEDDES. The present Committee on Claims?

Mr. LONG. The present committee.

Mr. GEDDES. They have not.

Mr. LONG. Would it not be well for the committee to examine one of these cases in order to make it certain that the investigation has been thorough. It is impossible, I know, for the committee to examine them all, but it might examine one as a test case.

Mr. GEDDES. The present committee has not made such an examination, but a former committee did make the examination and made it very carefully.

Mr. HOUK. If the gentleman will permit, I wish to ask him whether he himself was not the chairman of the identical committee in a former Congress that made the examination of which he speaks?

Mr. GEDDES. I was, Mr. Chairman. I was on the subcommittee that made the examination and on the committee that reported these cases. I went over them in person, with my colleague, Mr. ROWELL, and I believe Mr. JONES, as a subcommittee, and I was present with the full committee which reported them to the House.

Mr. HOUK. That is the fact that I wanted to bring out.

Mr. GEDDES. And now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this by way of apology for the committee not undertaking to repeat the work this time. We have had sent to us by the House during the present session about fifteen hundred bills and petitions relating to claims. Many of them are ready for action; many of them are cases which were reported on favorably after careful examination by our committee in the last Congress. They were reported favorably, but were not reached; they fell because we had not time to reach them in the last Congress. In view of this fact, I, as a member of that committee, felt that in justice to that class of claimants they should be preferred, and that we should pass upon their cases now, rather than to waste the early, precious days of our session in going over work that has been gone over very carefully. To what extent the other members of the committee may have relied upon the investigation heretofore made by this committee in the last Congress I am not able to say; I speak only for myself. I do know this, however, and I desire to state it because it is important, if these cases are disposed of now we shall probably be able in this Congress to dispose of a large amount of the other business before the committee, but if we are to undertake a reinvestigation of the claims embraced in this bill we shall certainly fail to reach that other business or even to get rid of these claims.

We expect to go over another collection of this class of cases just reported to us as soon as we can after the burden of business incident to the earlier part of the session is disposed of. This is my apology for not having gone over them heretofore at this Congress.

Mr. LONG. I think the gentleman is quite right. It only occurred to me it might be well to establish a precedent upon an examination of at least one or two claims in this list in order to insure accuracy on the part of the department, and to create a feeling there that it is held to careful scrutiny and examination.

Mr. GEDDES. I think that will be the effect from the fact that we have excluded seven of these cases, which will hereafter be considered.

I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Before the gentleman sits down I would like to ask him the reason of the amendment which has been made striking out lines 168 to 172.

Mr. GEDDES. I think the parties concerned would not be interested in having that inquiry pressed now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not wish to add anything to what has been said in reference to the matter by my colleague on the committee [Mr. GEDDES]. I only wish to ask, as I could not distinctly hear his statement, whether he said that it was the understanding of the committee that the seven cases in which claims have been stricken out should be considered with the next cases coming before the committee.

Mr. GEDDES. I did.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is all I desire to ascertain.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN]?

Mr. GEDDES. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Five or ten minutes.

Mr. GEDDES. I will yield the gentleman ten minutes if he requires that much time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Having introduced this bill on an early day of the session, it is not improper I should make a statement concerning the claims which are not embraced in it as reported by the committee. The bill as I introduced it carried claims to the amount of $228,578; the bill as reported by the committee embraces claims to the amount of $221,402 of these. All the claims which were contained in the bill introduced by me had received favorable consideration at the hands of the Quartermaster-General and the Third Auditor of the Treasury in pursuance of the act of July 4, 1864, and had been recommended for payment. They had first been investigated by agents of the Quartermaster's Department sent into the community where the property was taken and used. I think there is no question that every claim embraced in the bill I presented before the holidays was properly included. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] prefers to reserve action of the committee upon the claims my bill provided for, amounting to about $6,000; and if upon examination they should be found to be correct, to include them in the next bill, which arrangement virtually leaves them without adjudication by the committee in this bill one way or another. To that I have no objection.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to inquire for what reason those claims have been left out?

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Ohio has stated that the committee preferred to look further into them. I know no reason why they may not be paid, and I have no doubt that when the committee shall come to consider them minutely (which, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, they propose to do), those claims will be recommended and passed.

Mr. STEELE. One other question. As I understand, these claims are first investigated by the agent of the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. MCMILLIN. They are first investigated by the agents of the Quartermaster's Department in the community where the property was taken.

Mr. STEELE. And then by the Quartermaster-General?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then by the Quartermaster-General, and by him reported to the Third Auditor.

Mr. STEELE. Then they are examined by the Third Auditor?

Mr. MCMILLIN. And after examination by the Second Comptroller and the Third Auditor they are reported to Congress. In these cases all these different examining officers have recommended the payment of the claims.

Mr. STEELE. But, in point of fact, there is only one real investigation into the claim—the investigation by the agent of the Quartermaster's Department; these other officers only examine what the agent has done.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The claims go from the Quartermaster-General's Department to the Third Auditor on the proof taken by the Quartermaster-General. The difference between the investigation in the Quartermaster-General's Department and that by the Second Comptroller and Third Auditor is, that the claims go to these latter officers upon the proof taken before the Quartermaster-General, and no additional evidence can then be taken, as I understand.

Mr. STEELE. In point of fact, just such papers as are submitted to the very first examining officer are re-examined by these other officers?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEELE. Then there is, in point of fact, only one examination.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In that my friend from Indiana is in error. There are three examinations. It is analogous to a case in the courts, where there may be two trials, one in the inferior and one in the supreme court, on the same evidence.

In point of fact there is the recommendation of three officers upon the evidence taken by the agents of the Department.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these claims have been pending for more than twenty years, and it ought to be borne in mind that for all this period these claims bear not one cent of interest, and the claimants only get the principal of a debt that has been unpaid for that long period.

Mr. GEDDES. Will my friend from Tennessee permit me a moment? I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] that there is only one investigation ought not to be allowed to pass uncontroverted.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have stated to the gentleman from Indiana that there are three investigations before the claims come here; and then there is a fourth investigation by the committee of this House.

Mr. GEDDES. Each passing judgment as to the weight of the evidence, the credibility of the witnesses, and all the facts in the case.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Certainly, and each department having the right to reject the whole claim if it be deemed proper to do so or to scale it.

Mr. GEDDES. And they often do so in fact.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And each department having the right to reject the whole of them if they see proper.

Mr. GEDDES. And often do.

Mr. MCMILLIN. This House reserves to itself the right to reject the recommendations of all.

Mr. STEELE. In point of fact does it not depend upon the whim of the agent in the field, whether he is favorable to the claim or not, whether the evidence will be deemed sufficient to secure a report for its payment?

Mr. MCMILLIN. His whim does not amount to a feather so far as allowing an unjust claim is concerned.

Mr. HOUK. It does not depend upon the whim of anybody.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It depends solely on the evidence which is presented in favor of a claim or against it, and the whim of a quartermaster's agent does not bind the Auditor, the committee, or Congress to the payment of an improper claim.

Mr. STEELE. But it depends upon the whim of the Quartermaster's agent to receive such evidence only as he deems fit and proper.

Mr. GEDDES. He receives the testimony which is brought to him.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Certainly, I yield to my colleague.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Is it not true that all the Quartermaster's agent does is simply to collect all the facts in the case without offering any opinion at all? Does he not simply report the facts touching every particular matter to the Quartermaster-General for his action?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes, sir; the agent of the Quartermaster-General's Office submits a brief, accompanied by all the evidence, to the officers who have the matter in charge and who may allow it or reject it. As a matter of fact one-tenth of the cases are rejected even where the Quartermaster-General's agents report in favor of their payment. I know of a number of instances where the agent has recommended payment and where the department has rejected the cases. I have examined hundreds of them from first to last, and I do not hesitate to say ninety-nine cases are wrongfully rejected where one is wrongfully allowed. No doubt many good claims are rejected, but I do not remember a single instance where a questionable claim has been allowed. Indeed, so far as I know, it is the most stringent investigating department of this Government. It seems to start out with the fixed presumption that the claim is wrong, or it seems to act upon such a principle, for if they have a single doubt about the loyalty of a claimant, or in reference to the taking of the property, or its use by the Army, they reject it. No devastation is paid for, nor is payment made for any waste or any destruction. It has held rigidly it will not pay anything of that kind—that it will only pay for property taken from the class of citizens described in what is known as the 4th of July act, and which property was used for the benefit of the Army. It is only for property so taken and actually used by the Army that is proposed to be paid for in this bill.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] speaks of the whims of the agents of the Quartermaster-General's Department. Now I see here a number of claims from his own State, and it is a whimsical proceeding then that goes all round the circle. There are citizens from half a dozen States embraced in this bill to whom payment is provided under the 4th of July act. The bill as brought here is framed upon the presumption that the Government that has $150,000,000 of surplus laying idly in its Treasury can not afford to refuse to pay to a decrepit and pauper-stricken citizen the sum of $150 which it justly owes him. Let us pass this bill, and pay to the claimants the money out of which they have been too long kept already.

Mr. GEDDES. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. GEDDES. Then I will now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK].

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to prolong this matter by undue discussion, nor indeed would I say anything were it not that there seems to be some misapprehension as to the object of this bill and as to the justice of the claims reported by it. In the first place the new members of the House may not understand it; the old members, or most of them, will remember this bill was reported by the War Claims Committee at the last Congress, but because of pressure of business and lack of time it was not passed. The investigation which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] seemed to desire should be made by the committee of this House was in fact made by the old committee of the last House, then presided over by the same chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES], who makes the report at the present session. So it is the same man reporting the bill who tells the House that he did personally investigate it sufficiently to satisfy himself of the justice and equity of these claims. So, then, that objection, it seems to me, is removed.

Now, a word as to the method of investigation. In reply to the remark of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] that the allowance of these claims depends upon the whims of the Quartermaster-General's agents; why, sir, they go into the neighborhood of the claimant, they go upon the premises, examine everthing he has, and, as has been already intimated by my colleague, they go seemingly on the presumption fixed in their minds that every claim is bad until it is proved by adequate evidence certainly to be a good one; and claims that have run the gauntlet of such investigation, required by the law and practice of the department in such cases, is certainly entitled to the most implicit confidence and should be paid. And not only are they investigated in the neighborhood and upon the ground, but every detail of the examination is reported to the Quartermaster-General, who can refuse their payment. They also have to pass the Third Auditor, who can refuse to pay them; and finally they have to pass the Comptroller of the Treasury, who has to approve them before they can be paid. After passing such an ordeal it would neither be right nor just to refuse their payment.

So, Mr. Chairman, this bill ought to have been passed more than twelve months ago. These people have been for years without their money. Twenty years, at least, have elapsed since the property was taken, and they are getting no interest. It is a debt due to a class of men who are not able to lose it. They are in need of the amount due them, and the Government, in justice to its loyal citizens, should pay them promptly.

Mr. CUTCHEON. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question?

Mr. HOUK. With pleasure.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to ask who, in this investigation made by the Quartermaster-General, represents the interest of the Government?

Mr. HOUK. The Quartermaster's agent.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Who decides what testimony shall be taken, and what testimony shall not be taken, in support of the claim?

Mr. HOUK. The agent decides it himself. He has printed instructions from the department, which show him clearly the line of investigation which he must pursue and which direct him what investigation to make in every case. As I know from my own experience, he goes to the utmost limit in the examination of each case. He even goes into the fields where it is alleged the corn was grown and into the cribs from which it was taken.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to ask further this question: After this agent gets through with his investigations is there any testimony thereafter taken by anybody?

Mr. HOUK. I do not know of any such cases unless the case is remanded for a new investigation.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Then, if that Quartermaster's agent should happen to be in collusion with the claimant, there would be no one to represent the interests of the Government?

Mr. HOUK. If there is any doubt involved in the report it is recommitted for re-examination. I have known cases where claims were allowed which were not satisfactory to the Quartermaster's Department, and they were rereferred. As in all cases where the Government makes a special examination through its agents, and is not satisfied with the examination or the report upon any single point, it recommits the claim for a rehearing or re-examination, sometimes to a new man, and goes through another investigation, until the Government is absolutely satisfied. The requirements of the department before a claim of this kind is allowed are technical and hard to comply with. It is like going through the eye of a needle to get a claim through.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GEDDES. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL].

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the subcommittee of the War Claims Committee in the last Congress which examined this 4th of July bill. All the evidence in each one of these claims is sent to the War Claims Committee, and I think I am safe in saying that the subcommittee having this bill in charge in the last Congress made a more extensive examination of the evidence than has been customary in claims of this kind. We examined in each class of claims a number of cases with a view of ascertaining the diligence and the reliability as well as the honesty of such of the agents of the Quartermaster's Department reporting these cases; and because of our desire to discover whether there had been any looseness on the part of the department, or any lack of ability or integrity on the part of the Quartermaster's agents, this bill was delayed until a very late date in the session. We held it up for a long time while making that examination.

We sifted out, after all that investigation, seven of the claims, which we determined not to report, because the committee believed that the agent investigating a certain class of claims had not been quite as diligent as he ought to have been, and that he had leaned in favor of certain claimants in his recommendations in these particular cases, and therefore these seven claims were stricken out, were not recommended for passage, and are not in this bill. Now I do not believe, sir, that any case is tried in the courts of this country, upon depositions taken, where there can be any more reliance placed upon the testimony than there can be upon the testimony taken in support of these 4th of July claims. While it is possible that a dishonest man may be an agent of the Quartermaster's Department, and may dishonestly take testimony, it is equally true that a commissioner appointed to take testimony in any court may be a dishonest man and enter into collusion with dishonest witnesses, and the court would thereby be deceived. But every possible safeguard that can be suggested by law has been thrown around this class of claims. The law presumes that all the citizens down in Tennessee who remained there during the continuance of the war are disloyal; and they go before the Quartermaster's agent with a presumption not only against their claim as a proper claim against the Government because of any property taken, but with the presumption against their right to have any pay even if their property had been taken; and before a quartermaster's agent can pass a favorable judgment upon any of these claims, or before officers of the department when the claims reach Washington can pass favorably upon them there must be affirmatively conclusive proof of two things: First, the taking and conversion to the use of the Government of the property; and, second, that at the time the property was taken the claimant was a loyal citizen of the United States. I think Congress can just as safely pass upon this whole bill as a court of law could pass upon the report of a master in chancery upon facts proved before him; and therefore I hope there will be no opposition to the passage of the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GEDDES. I yield now to the gentleman from Tennessee five minutes.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Chairman, this bill is based upon the idea that allegiance and protection go together. I heard a question put here during this debate as to how the United States can guard itself against frauds in such cases, and I propose to answer that question.

Now, the instructions given to a quartermaster's agent are, first go and ascertain if the claimant was loyal to the United States. And I want to say this, and I desire gentlemen from the South to hear me, that you know and I know that if any man who was not loyal to the United States should prefer a claim against the Government and set up a plea of loyalty as a basis for the claim his neighbors would spurn him at once. There is no better test than to go into the neighborhood where everybody knows whether a man was loyal or not and there make open inquiry; and I know cases where the confederates testified that a man was loyal all through the war because it was true and of neighborhood notoriety, that they had personal knowledge of the fact.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow himself to be interrupted for one moment?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to state that the district I have the honor to represent sent to Congress as its Representative for six or ten years a man who was entirely loyal to the Union during the war; I refer to Judge Hancock.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I do not question it. The gentleman from Texas has not understood me. The question is how do we pass on these claims. And I said if one who had been a confederate claimed he was loyal during the war his confederate neighbors would frown him down.

Mr. SAYERS. I understood the gentleman to say that if a man was loyal to the Union he would be spurned by his confederate neighbors.

Mr. PETTIBONE. The gentleman understood me entirely wrong and has been merely taking up my time. What I wanted to say was that if a disloyal man should pretend, in order to get a claim through, that he had been a loyal citizen when he had not been loyal, even his confederate neighbors would spurn him.

That being the fact, the first question is, Was the man loyal? That being settled, the next question is, Did he furnish this property to the United States Army; and, if he did, when did he do it and to whom?

Now, Mr. Chairman, recollect it was generally the custom during the war that receipts were given; and then the question of the receipt comes up. Was it a genuine receipt? Was there a United States force there and did it take the property? All this is not assumed as a matter of notoriety, but the claimant must prove it, and prove it against the presumption that the property was not taken and against the presumption that he was disloyal. I do not know a fine-tooth-comb proof anywhere that could scratch out the real truth from the falsehood more completely than this. Recollect that the claimant comes forward after many, if not all, the witnesses are dead, after the men who knew the facts have passed away; and in such a case the poor claimant can not get a penny unless he affirmatively proves he was loyal to the Government all through the war, that the property was taken and consumed by the Federal Army, and that the Federal Army had to use it and had to have it.

The claimant having proved all this, the testimony is then sent to to the Quartermaster-General's Office, and the Quartermaster-General passes upon it. It then goes to the Third Auditor, and he again reviews it and passes upon it. Then it comes to this House, and a committee of this House examines these facts again and passes upon them. I think we can safely vote for the bill which this committee has reported.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GEDDES. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

Mr. WOLFORD. I only desire three minutes in the discussion of this question. I am not to discuss this question of loyalty, for I confess I hold the broad doctrine that every man who has furnished to the Army of the United States anything to sustain it, or any property that was taken from any individual, loyal or disloyal, is entitled under the Constitution of our country to be paid for it in the event of proof being clear. I hold that broad doctrine, and I acted on it during the war, when I refused, under the expectation of being arrested, to allow my men or any officer under me in my division to take any property without signing a voucher for it.

I hold it is the constitutional right of every citizen who furnished supplies to the Government that he should be paid for them. Surely no man on either side of the House, whatever his view may be about this question of loyalty, will deny that every citizen is entitled to the full, complete, and ample protection of the law. The Constitution being the highest law in the land, paramount to everything else, gives a constitutional and personal right that the Supreme Court has decided can not be taken from any citizen.

In my State and in your State these claimants have undergone all the tests of loyalty. They furnished supplies freely and willingly in my State; they were willing that the Government should take and use everything they had; and now they say, "We gave to our country ourselves and everything the Government desired; we have done this and the Government has received and used our property." Now, shall we, after a lapse of twenty years and when proof is furnished sufficient to warrant any jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff—shall we say we shall not pay? Shall this proud and glorious Government of ours go back and repudiate an honest debt? for if ever there was an honest debt on the face of the earth every one of those reported here is an honest debt.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GEDDES. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. GEDDES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The beneficiaries of this bill are the enforced creditors of the United States. The Government compelled them to become its creditors. In the second place, the bill covers a class of claims recognized by the statutes of the United States to be lawful. These men having become creditors, having been coerced to become creditors, the Government has provided a tribunal in which their cause is to be heard.

They had no remedy, they have no remedy except the remedy provided by law. The Government, being a sovereignty, can not be sued save by its own consent. Not only has the Government provided the tribunal, but it has prescribed the remedy that these creditors are compelled to pursue. The Government has not established a court and said to the claimant, "You may bring your testimony into court and establish your claim;" but the Government, under the authority of its own law, sends out its agents to collect such proofs as the Government requires. I assert that the proofs taken in these cases are such as the Government itself, by its agents, selects. Now let us see how the matter stands. The Government compels these men to become its creditors; the Government furnishes the tribunal in which the claimants are to be heard; the Government prescribes the character of the proof to be taken; the Government sends out its agents to make the investigation, and the proof taken is such as the Government selects. That proof is then submitted to the officers named by the law, who have authority to approve or disallow the claims. Up to this point the creditor has had little to do with the matter except to part with his property. That is about the extent of his connection with the transaction. Now, I assert that, if the statutes mean anything, when these claims, legal under the law, have been allowed by tribunals which the law selects, this Congress has nothing else to do with them but to make an appropriation for their payment.

Mr. PETTIBONE. That is all there is in this bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Very well. That I say is all we ought to have to do about it. The court established by the Government has sat in these cases; they have been tried upon testimony taken and selected by the Government; the Government itself has allowed the claims, and they would have been paid out of the Treasury but for the provision of law that no money can be taken out of the Treasury until it has been appropriated by an act of the Congress of the United States, which appropriates very reluctantly, except when it appropriates to pay itself.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] allow a question?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND. Have not former Houses of Representatives uniformly passed this bill almost without objection?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That is my understanding. Such I believe to be the precedents in these cases.

A MEMBER. Let us vote.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would not have said this much about this matter, but that ever since I have had the honor to represent a constituency on this floor I have been impressed with the fact that the Government treats its creditors shamefully, especially the poor unfortunate men who have small claims, who live at a great distance from the capital, and who neither have the means of themselves nor a sum involved in the controversy which would justify them in securing the services of some one to log-roll their claims through Congress—and I do not use the word "log-roll" in any offensive sense. This Calendar is encumbered by five, six, eight thousand private claims during every Congressional term. The committees are so overloaded with them that they can not examine all cases, and, in the very nature of things, they take up those claims to which their attention is called. Therefore it is the importunate creditor that secures the consideration of his claim, and not necessarily the one whose claim possesses the most merit. What we ought to do is to pay quickly such claims as are adjudicated, and then, as to those that must be investigated here or elsewhere, we ought to establish a tribunal, allow the Government to be sued, and give the creditor an opportunity to establish his claim by proof and get out of the Treasury the money that is due to him.

Mr. GEDDES. I desire to retain time enough to ask formal action by the Committee of the Whole in this matter. If I have any time to yield I would be glad to yield to one or two other gentlemen who are present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. GEDDES. I yield three minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, thirty-eight of the claims included in this bill are located in the southern part of the State of Ohio; eighteen of them in the Congressional district which I represent. They aggregate $4,377, and embrace claims running from $5 up to a little over $100. The State of Ohio organized by law a board of commissioners, who divided into three classes the vast volume of claims growing out of the invasion of Ohio under what was called "the Morgan raid." The first class embraced what were called "Union claims," being for property bought and receipted for by Government officers. The other two classes of claims it is not important to speak of now. These claims embraced in this bill are for property taken by the quartermasters, the colonels of regiments, and the commanders of troops, for which receipts were given, and the property applied to the uses of the Government.

This property was taken twenty-one years ago. It was estimated at a low valuation. No compensation has ever been made by the Government; the attempts of these people to procure payment have been baffled at every step. The investigation made by the commissioners in Ohio was a thorough investigation, and the evidence was reduced to writing. The claims were thoroughly analyzed and passed upon, and all the testimony was forwarded to the Quartermaster-General of the United States. If there ever were claims that were honest and lawful and ought to be paid, it seems to me these are such claims. There is no question as to the loyalty of these claimants.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GEDDES. Before asking formal action by the Committee of the Whole on this bill, I wish to correct a verbal error. I have discovered in looking over the Ohio cases a claim of $30 allowed to a party in "Ripley County." We have no such county in Ohio; and I am told by a friend it should be "Brown County." I move, therefore, to amend by striking out "Ripley," in line 1964, and inserting "Brown." This is a mere matter of form.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEDDES. I now move that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEDDES. Before this bill is laid aside I ask unanimous consent to make an amendment by inserting in line 1642, at the end of the Kentucky cases, these words: "To Elizabeth Carson, Bourbon County, $2,780.40." This amendment is based upon a report sent to me within a day or two showing that the case was investigated and payment recommended by the Secretary of War as well as the Quartermaster-General.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to insert in the bill which has just been laid aside the amendment indicated. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is ordered accordingly.

ESTATE OF C. M. BRIGGS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3828) for the relief of the estate of C. M. Briggs, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Court of Claims is hereby given like jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of the personal representative of C. M. Briggs, deceased, for the proceeds of cotton now in the Treasury of the United States, as is given to said court by the acts of March 12, 1863, and July 2, 1864, upon petition filed in said court at any time within two years from the passage of this act, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this is a claim which originated with others for property captured by order of the commanding general in the State of Mississippi. The property in question, being cotton belonging to C. M. Briggs, of Louisville, Ky., was captured with the cotton of a number of other citizens. Under an act of Congress, two years were allowed these parties to bring suits in the Court of Claims to establish their title to the property. Mr. Briggs, a loyal man, who resided in Louisville, Ky., failed to bring suit within the specified time, the reason of the failure being, as set forth in the testimony, that he did not know until the two years had elapsed that the right of action had accrued to him.

The Committee on War Claims, having considered carefully this whole question, find that the loyalty of Mr. Briggs is established beyond doubt; that the cotton was taken and sold, and the money covered into the Treasury; that everybody else who had cotton captured at that time, the lot consisting of more than 2,000 bales, took advantage of the right given by act of Congress to sue. All the other parties presented their claims, had them tried, and received payment. This bill recommended by the committee simply proposes that the legal representative of Mr. Briggs be now allowed to go into the Court of Claims and have this claim adjudicated. The money is already in the Treasury; there is simply desired an opportunity to test the rightfulness of the claim, and if the court decide favorably, to have compensation paid for the cotton as was done in other cases.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire that the report in this case be read.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of J. A. Briggs, executor of C. M. Briggs, deceased, make the following report:

C. M. Briggs was a man of undoubted loyalty, living in Louisville, Ky., and was the owner of 455 bales of cotton, situated in Washington County, Mississippi, in 1863.

On the 7th day of March, 1863, by orders issued from the headquarters of General Grant, Captain Osband, of the Fourth Illinois, was directed to capture cotton and forage for the use of the Army, and in pursuance of said orders he proceeded to Worthington's Landing, in said county, and seized 2,180 bales of cotton, the property of sundry people, loaded it upon the steamer Empress, and carried it to Memphis, Tenn., where it was, by proper orders and authority, turned over to Capt. G. L. Fort, assistant quartermaster of the United States, and by him sold, and the net proceeds, after paying all expenses of sale, were paid into the public Treasury under the act of March 12, 1863, to be there held in trust for the benefit of the owners by the Government. The aforesaid cotton of Briggs was included in the said seizure and sale, and his money is still, by report of the Treasury officials, on deposit for his benefit. The other owners have all been paid their money who have presented their claims. Mr. Briggs, being a non-resident of Mississippi and a loyal man, on account of the dangerous and unsettled condition of the country was unable to ascertain the facts in regard to his claim until the two years authorized by the act of March 12, 1863, in which to prefer his claim, had expired, and he died shortly afterwards, having prepared before his death a part of the proof to sustain his claim, which has been completed by his executor.

Your committee believe his claim just, and therefore recommend that his executor be allowed to sue in the Court of Claims, as provided in the act of March 12, 1863, and report a bill for his benefit and ask its passage.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to know whether this is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir; a unanimous report.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to know something about this claim before we pass upon it. It involves payment for 455 bales of the cotton stated to have been seized in 1863. At that time cotton was very valuable. There is nothing in this report to show the amount of money involved in this claim. Can the gentleman reporting this measure state how much this claim amounts to?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The claims amount to about $90,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that a claim amounting to $90,000 was of sufficient importance to induce the claimant to prosecute his suit therefor in the Court of Claims long before this time, and not delay it until now, twenty-two years after the cause of action.

For the first time it has been called to my attention as pending in Congress, and we are asked to give the representative of the owners a status in the Court of Claims whereby he will be able, if he can prove up his title, to obtain a judgment against the United States for the full amount of the claim. As stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] who reports this bill, that judgment would amount in the aggregate to $90,000. The Government of the United States, in the very nature of things, must be at great disadvantage after this long lapse of time in defending the Treasury against any such demand. The witnesses have died or gone to parts unknown and can not be secured, so that this party, however the facts may be, may be able to prove he was loyal to the Government of the United States in the first place, and, secondly, that he or those he represents were the owners of this property. What protection in such cases, where claims have been deferred for so long a period, has the Government of the United States against the allowance and payment of claims that may be unjust and would have been rejected if they had been presented at the time the witnesses were living and could have been obtained to give their testimony against them?

Now, sir, it may be that these parties have been diligent in prosecuting their rights. If they have, they certainly should have obtained a hearing before this in some of the Departments of the Government. Twenty-two years is a limitation which bars claims even to real estate, and yet this claim for personal property is now here after this great lapse of time, and this claimant is now here asking that Congress shall grant to him a status in the courts of the country whereby he will be entitled on obtaining a judgment to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States a very large sum of money, amounting, as I have already stated, to $90,000.

I submit the report in this case should have enlightened the House as to these facts to which I have called attention, and chiefly as to the reason for the long delay to seek a hearing of the case. I know claimants before Congress are put to great disadvantage, I know how utterly ineffectual is the remedy offered by Congressional legislation to private claimants, but at the same time I feel it is the duty of the members of Congress as far as possible to protect the interests of the Government in matters of this kind.

I would suggest, therefore, to those having this claim in charge that instead of asking us to authorize the Court of Claims to render judgment against the United States for the amount involved, they should ask us to authorize the Court of Claims to make a special finding and report to Congress for its action all the facts, and especially why the presentation of the claim has been delayed for all these twenty-two years. For myself, I would prefer to send it to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the Bowman act, for the judicial ascertainment of the facts, so that Congress hereafter may determine upon the report submitted to it by the Court of Claims as to whether this claim should be paid or not.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is not the only case which will be paid if this bill should pass, for this will be taken as a precedent for the allowance of a large number of similar cases. I have not the figures before me, but probably my friend from Indiana will enlighten the committee on the subject as to how much money is now in the Treasury. I do not remember myself exactly what it is. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and he, perhaps, has had his attention called to the matter. I understand, however, there are many millions of dollars in the Treasury as the proceeds of the sale of captured and abandoned property. If, then, we open up the way to this fund gentlemen of the House may be assured that the ingenuity of attorneys and the india-rubber consciences of claimants will be adequate to the case in hand. They will reach it and soon rob the Treasury of whatever it may be.

Mr. GEDDES. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. GEDDES. I was warmly in sympathy with you the other day when you proposed to have some means devised by the ingenuity and skill of man by which this House would be relieved of the burden and responsibility of these investigations. Now, here is a court competent to decide, and when the committee seek to relieve the House from the responsibility of investigating this case by its reference to that court I understand you to resist that proposed action, and ask it should be allowed to remain here and be determined by Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will agree to send the case to the Court of Claims for the judicial ascertainment of all the facts involved in it, but this bill sends it there for the allowance of a judgment against the Government of the United States to the amount of $90,000, which will have to be paid out of the Treasury. If gentlemen desire a judicial ascertainment of the facts, and especially of the reasons why the parties in interest in this case have failed to prosecute before the Departments and courts of the country their rights, then I am willing to afford them that opportunity; but now after twenty-two years have elapsed, after the witnesses on the side of the Government have died or disappeared, after they have moved away and are inaccessible to the process of the courts, it seems to me to be a great hardship the Government should be put to the disadvantage of defending itself against so large a claim.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Whose fault is it that no tribunal has been established before which claimants against the Government could have their cases adjudicated?

Mr. SPRINGER. I think it is the fault of the several Republican Congresses which have been in session from 1864, or, if you please, from 1861 down until 1875, when the advent of a Democratic Congress occurred—that it is the fault of those Republican Congresses who up to fifteen years after the close of the war failed in both branches of Congress to provide an adequate tribunal before which these claimants could go and assert their rights.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, now, just one moment. I suppose if I were to suggest a plan of salvation here, by which all men would be saved, the gentleman from Illinois would ask whether it was Democratic or not.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no; not at all. I would know that it was Democratic. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, that would depend upon what they are being saved for. [Renewed laughter.]

What I desire to know, however, is simply this: Whether the claimant is to blame in this case for not prosecuting his claim against the Government if there was no tribunal fixed by the Government before which he could prosecute it? I understand the gentleman from Illinois objects to this bill on the ground that the witnesses for the Government may possibly have ceased to live or that they can not be found, and, therefore, that the interests of the Government would be jeopardized. Now I ask this House if that is a fair reason for refusing to grant a citizen of this Republic the right to determine whether or not he shall have a judgment against his Government, if, upon a statement of facts before a competent tribunal, it is shown that he is entitled to it?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will answer the gentleman from Ohio if my friend from Illinois will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. The only question which can be raised in reference to such cases as this is as to the statute of limitations itself. There was a tribunal before which such cases could be taken——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. What was it?

Mr. HOLMAN. These parties were entitled to go into the Court of Claims under the original act, provided only that their claims were presented within two years. Otherwise they were barred by the statute, and the only question that is presented now is whether or not that is or was a reasonable limitation.

It was fixed at two years, and during that period, which expired, if my memory serves me right, in 1865, the court was open to all such claimants; and therefore what should be considered by the Congress of the United States is, and I repeat it is the only question presented, whether or not the facts presented call upon Congress to set aside that statute of limitations and extend it in the particular case under consideration. That is all; and it is the only question raised upon these claims ever since 1865. If the parties had a sufficient time to go into the Court of Claims no extension has ever been granted. The question as to whether two years was a fair period has been considered, and if in any particular case it was not so considered Congress has set aside such limitation and permitted the party to go in and present his claim. This has been done in several instances since 1865. So the statement that no court has been open for the adjudication of these claims is a mistake.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The trouble with my friend from Indiana, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit me to proceed a little further, is that it was not upon that hypothesis that the gentleman from Illinois is proceeding. The question he raises is as to whether, considering this bill, it is fair to this claimant to say that inasmuch as the Government of the United States may not now be able to procure its testimony that therefore he should be barred, and should not be allowed to have a hearing before any tribunal to determine his rights.

My friend will remember that the act which afforded relief, to which he refers, was passed, if I am not mistaken, in 1863.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is correct.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And the limitation which was fixed within which such claim might be filed expired in 1865.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Therefore during that period of two years testimony in support of the claim must have been presented, if at all. Now, my friend from Illinois wants to know why it is that this testimony was not presented in that period.

Mr. HOLMAN. But if an action was brought for recovery during that period it remained pending, of course, until finally disposed of.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I am aware of that; but I want to ascertain the views of the gentleman as to whether upon the facts presented it is just to the several claimants against the Government to refuse them a hearing because they had no tribunal to which they could appeal; and I submit, in support of that position, and in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, that between 1863 and 1865 it was a very difficult matter to procure the testimony required. The country was in a very unsettled condition. And I want to add that our Government, and I think my friend from Indiana will sympathize with me in the statement even if he finds fault with the facts upon which it is based, that this Government is the most exacting government in the world when it comes to proceed against a debtor, and thoroughly unjust and illiberal when it comes to according full justice to a creditor. I understand the committee to be practically unanimous in recommending the passage of this bill, and that they so report, upon the ground that this party has not been permitted to have his day in court. Is that not correct?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir. The reason Mr. Briggs never went into court was because he lived in Louisville, Ky., and the witnesses and the testimony and all things necessary to establish his claim in the courts were in Mississippi, in Illinois, and in other parts of the country. The country was in a most unsettled condition. Mr. Briggs testifies himself that he did not know until a few months after the expiration of the limitation act that he was entitled to bring suit in the courts. He has been trying since 1868 to get before Congress. The gentleman from Illinois asks why he comes here twenty-two years after the claim originated. He has been here asking relief since 1868. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if it had been fifty years, if the Government of the United States can afford to discriminate between two men, and say that here is a man who shall be paid for a certain class of property, and here is another who has the same class of property which was taken at the same time, which was disposed of at the same time, the money paid into the Treasury at the same time, and yet it will not afford him relief?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. I understand the Government is authorized in this matter to make every proper defense.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir. All the bill proposes is that the claimant shall go before the court on precisely the same terms as he would have gone if he had gone during the first two years. The Treasurer of the United States says the money is there for him. It belongs to him. It can not be paid without adjudication by a court; and the claimant simply asks the Congress of the United States to authorize him to go there inside the limitations prescribed by the act of 1863 and to get his own money from the Treasury.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I want to know for the information of the whole House whether this is not the state of facts: That the cotton was taken by the Government and sold and the money put in the Treasury. And whether this bill does anything more than say that the Court of Claims shall be opened, and if this man was a loyal man and the property really taken by the Government and the money is in the Treasury he shall have a right to show it, and if he shows it he shall have his own money?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. That is what the bill proposes. That the claimant shall be allowed to go into the court and establish the taking of the property and his loyalty and every other requirement; and if it is found the conditions necessary for the money being paid exist he shall be paid; and if not, he shall not be paid.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now resume the floor. I ask the chairman of the Committee on War Claims [Mr. GEDDES] whether there are other bills pending in that committee authorizing suits to be brought in the Court of Claims for payment for cotton captured under like circumstances?

Mr. GEDDES. I am not able to speak of particular claims; but I shall be very much surprised if every possible variety of claim can not be found in our committee. There are fifteen hundred bills, and everything of this kind that can be well conceived of is to be found there. There may be others of this character.

Mr. SPRINGER. The fact that before the Committee on War Claims are fifteen hundred bills of private claims, and I may say before the Committee on Invalid Pensions fifteen hundred other cases, and before the Committee on Claims a thousand cases, all asking relief from Congress for various reasons and on account of various claims, demonstrates conclusively the utter want of relief that is afforded by this system of legislation.

There is one gentleman that perhaps by some special diligence has got his case before the committee. There are some four or five millions of dollars in like condition to the proceeds sought here by this bill. Why not bring in a bill to remove the statute of limitations as to all of them, and to allow all persons alike interested with these claimants to go to the Court of Claims and have an equal footing? This thing of doling out the privilege of a status in the courts to individuals by piecemeal and enabling the favored few who can come here by themselves or their attorneys to get a hearing and get into the courts and leaving others without any redress, is all wrong.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Have not cases similar to these been passed by Congress by unanimous consent on various occasions? And has not the gentleman from Illinois himself supported them and stood by and defended them?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Now is there anything wrong in allowing a man to go into the courts and ask whether or not the Government has money that belongs to him? The officials of the Government say the money is there, that it belongs to somebody, and this bill only asks that this claimant be allowed the right to go into the court and maintain and establish his right to it. Can, then, the Government afford to say they have got somebody's money, and then refuse to allow the claimant to be heard and to show that it belongs to him? In the last Congress I remember my distinguished colleague, now a Senator in the other wing of the Capitol, got unanimous consent to pass a bill just like this, and the gentleman from Illinois was here, and I know he heard it, for he always hears everything that is going on. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I have heard a great deal, but I have not yet heard the question the gentleman from Kentucky has put to me.

Mr. ROBERTSON. It is this: Have you not seen bills of this character passed by this House by unanimous consent?

Mr. SPRINGER. Not to my recollection. If I had been present I should have objected to it.

Mr. RYAN (to Mr. SPRINGER). Have you offered your amendment yet?

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to move to amend the bill by striking out the last clause naming the acts of March 12, 1863, and July 2, 1874, and inserting the provision which I will read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. BUCHANAN. While the gentleman from Illinois is preparing his amendment, I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] a question. Do I understand him correctly when I understand him as saying that the money for which this cotton was sold is now in the Treasury?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And has been there for what length of time?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Since 1863.

Mr. BUCHANAN. One other question: Did it constitute a portion of that "surplus" of which we have heard so much for the last year or two?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I would not be surprised if it did or did not.

Mr. ROGERS. It does not.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I am now prepared to offer my amendment. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims of the United States to investigate and determine the facts upon which is based the claim of J. A. Briggs, executor of C. M. Briggs, deceased, against the United States, for and on account of cotton said to have been captured in 1863. And all papers relating thereto in either House shall be transmitted to said court, which is required to consider the case under such rules as it may adopt, and subject to all the provisions of existing law, including those provisions requiring the Attorney-General or his assistants to appear for the defense and protection of the United States, but excepting any statute of limitation which may bar its prosecution. Said court shall report to Congress what amount, if anything, is due to said claimant, and whether such claim is founded upon any act of Congress, or upon any contract, express or implied; and if not founded upon any act of Congress or upon such contract, whether the United States, in the opinion of said court, ought, in justice or in equity, to pay said claim or any part thereof.

SEC. 2. That until said claim is finally considered and disposed of by said Court of Claims as herein provided, neither House of Congress shall consider the same; nor shall any committee of either House take any action in reference thereto; nor shall any officer of the United States pay the same or any part thereof, until Congress, after receiving the report of said court thereon, may order and direct its payment and fix and appropriate the amount to be paid in satisfaction thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, upon that amendment I desire to be heard very briefly. The difference between the amendment and the bill is simply this: Under the provisions of the bill the party is sent to the Court of Claims, which is authorized, under the acts referred to but not set forth, to hear and determine and enter a judgment against the United States, subject, I believe, to appeal on the part of each to the Supreme Court of the United States. This amendment sends the claim to the Court of Claims for judicial ascertainment of the facts, and for the finding of a special verdict as to how much, if any, of the amount claimed is to be paid. It sends it there subject to all the conditions of existing law, except the statute of limitation. The conditions are those enacted subsequent to the war, and more especially the provision in the Bowman act with regard to proof of loyalty on the part of the claimant. The amendment also requires the United States to appear and make such defense as seems to the Attorney-General proper to be made for the protection of the interests of the United States.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. In a moment. Now, Mr. Chairman, the reason I prefer the mode of adjudication provided for in the amendment is this: There are many cases of like nature now pending before Congress, and many others will come here if this bill is passed. Every party having an interest in the proceeds of this property which is said to be held in the Treasury has an equal right with this claimant to be heard and to have a status in the Court of Claims. I am willing to treat them all alike. Every case that comes here I am willing to send to the Court of Claims under these conditions, so that that court may ascertain, in a judicial way, the facts upon which the claims are based. Then, after we get all of them here and see how much they aggregate, the Congress of the United States will be able to pass upon them as a whole or in classes, and to determine whether the Government ought to refund the money claimed. By passing this bill you give the opportunity to one man; the others may never get an opportunity. Let us deal justly with all our claimants, if we can. Let us treat them in classes instead of dealing with them as individuals. In that way only can the Government approximate what may be called justice to its citizens. I yield now for the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has concluded, I want to call attention to one or two features of this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I thought the gentleman simply desired to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will not use up his two minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it is a strange kind of morality that would determine the obligation to pay a claim by merely asking if it was practicable to pay it. My friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] suggests that if these claims are large, possibly the Government would not pay them; he makes the ease with which we could pay a claim the measure of the justice of paying it. That certainly is not a very high standard of morality.

Now the ways of this House are inscrutable. We passed to-day, without a dissenting voice, a bill appropriating $222,000 in payment of a class of claims adjudicated by strolling agents who took testimony and referred it to the Quartermaster's Department or the Commissary Department. The department passed upon the claims and expressed an opinion as to whether they ought to be paid or not; and upon this mere suggestion—upon testimony in a large measure ex parte—this House appropriated this morning $222,000. Now what is proposed in this case? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks that this claim, after being referred to the Court of Claims for a judicial ascertainment of the amount due, be brought back to this House. Will the gentleman vote to pay the claim if that judicial tribunal shall determine the amount to be fairly and justly due——

Mr. SPRINGER. That would depend upon the facts.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Or would the gentleman wish to review the finding of that judicial tribunal? Why, sir, the gentleman has remained in his place this morning while we appropriated $222,000 to pay claims investigated only by an agent and reviewed by the Quartermaster-General or one of his clerks; and now, when a proposition is submitted to refer the present case to one of the highest tribunals of this country, in order that it may hear all the testimony and determine whether there shall be compensation for property of a citizen taken and appropriated by the Government, the gentleman insists that this House shall act as a court of appeal, and review possibly the judicial finding of that tribunal.

Why, Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the wisdom of referring this claim at all, it seems to me absurd to have it rereferred to the House. Either that judicial tribunal is not competent to pass upon this question, or else its finding ought to be binding upon the Government which it represents. Is it possible that this House with its three hundred and twenty-five members will be better able to determine whether the amount claimed is due to this citizen than that tribunal?

Why, sir, this claim when brought back here is to be referred, I presume, to a committee for an ex parte hearing—a committee upon which the peculiar efforts suggested by my friend from Illinois are invariably brought to bear. For my part I would rather submit the case to a determination of that judicial tribunal than to the judgment of this House, because after all the only reliable information we get is through committees; and no committee can determine as well as the Court of Claims can whether a certain amount is due to a citizen or not. I oppose the amendment as being a matter of injustice on the part of the Government toward a citizen. Hence I think it ought to be voted down. Let us either kill the bill or else abide by the judgment of the judicial tribunal to which we propose to refer the matter.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the House understood the facts of this case it would be enabled to vote for or against the amendment or the original bill according to its judgment of the justice of the claim as founded upon those facts. It so happens that while I never knew the claimant or his dead brother, whose heirs are to be the beneficiaries of whatever may be recovered under this bill, I know most of the witnesses whose testimony has been taken in this case; and the case is simply this: The late Governor Charles S. Morehead, of Kentucky, having become a very large cotton planter in Mississippi, sold, in the year 1862 or 1863, to Charles M. Briggs (both of them being citizens of Louisville and within the Federal lines), his cotton crop then baled on his plantation in the South. That sale was by a written contract, properly proven in these papers beyond all doubt, and by that sale Mr. Briggs became the owner of that cotton. In March, 1863, under a general order of General Grant, steamboats were sent to that part of Mississippi with orders to capture such cotton as they could; and the captain in charge of that detail captured 2,180 bales, of which 455 belonged to Mr. Briggs. These bales were put upon the steamer Empress, were carried to the city of Memphis, were subsequently sold, and the money was covered into the Treasury. Of that money, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in similar cases, the Government became the trustee, holding it in trust for such claimants as under the law might present their claims properly proven, and the Congress of the United States, by proper acts, gave to the claimants the right to go into court, but added, as a jurisdictional fact, that suit should be brought within two years. The Supreme Court decided that this two-year clause was not a law of limitation which must be pleaded by the Government, but was a jurisdictional statute, and that the claimant must show that he came within it.

Now, Mr. Briggs, residing in the city of Louisville, inside the Federal lines, had no means of ascertaining at what time or in what mode or by what person this cotton had been taken. Whether it had been captured by the Federal Government through its troops, or destroyed by raiders, or destroyed in the mutations and fortunes of war, was a matter of which he had no knowledge. He purchased, as these papers show, a half interest in a steamboat, and became a member of a company in which Mr. George D. Prentice and other gentlemen were involved with him, for the purpose of obtaining that cotton and other cotton after the fall of Vicksburg and after the semi-establishment of the Federal authority in that part of Mississippi. He was not granted the permits which under the military orders were then required. He did not ascertain until the year 1868 that his cotton had been captured by the Federal Government and its proceeds covered into the Federal Treasury.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS obtained the floor, and said: I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I thank the gentleman from Texas for his courtesy.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman who sold this cotton to Mr. Briggs was a loyal man.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I will answer that question as frankly as I am able. I did not see Governor Morehead from the time the war began. I was not a very loyal man myself; and when all these transactions were going on I was engaged in other duties than ascertaining the loyalty of gentlemen on the other side of the lines. But I understand as a matter of political history that Governor Morehead was arrested by the Federal authorities for disloyalty, was immured in one of the forts in the harbor of New York or Boston, was released—always claiming to be a loyal man—went to Europe till the war was over; came back after the close of the war, and always claimed to have been unjustly arrested. But whether loyal or not, he had no interest in this matter. He was inside the Federal lines. It was a commercial transaction in which he sold cotton to which he had title to a man indubitably loyal—a man whose loyalty is established by some of the very best citizens of Kentucky—among others by Mr. James Speed, ex-Attorney-General of the United States, a gentleman who was my preceptor, and who now lives an honored lawyer in the city of Louisville.

Mr. PETERS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PETERS. Did Mr. Briggs pay Governor Morehead money for his cotton?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. As to that I am not informed, except that the papers show that between Mr. Briggs and Governor Morehead there had been frequent "trades" running back long anterior to the war. They had been partners in the practice of the law and partners in the transaction of business. Mr. Briggs had been largely the security and indorser for Governor Morehead, a man of very high character. Upon a statement of their accounts Governor Morehead was largely indebted to Mr. Briggs actually, and still more largely contingently, upon indorsements which Mr. Briggs had made for him; and to secure Mr. Briggs, not only in respect to the debts which had accrued, but in reference to these contingent liabilities which Mr. Briggs assumed, Governor Morehead transferred to him this cotton. I do not think that so far as the papers go they show any money to have been paid; but this cotton was paid for by the release of indebtedness of Governor Morehead to Mr. Briggs and the assumption of liability by Mr. Briggs to creditors of Governor Morehead, Mr. Briggs being liable as security for Governor Morehead.

Now, to resume the thread of the narrative I was making, Mr. Briggs in 1868 discovered that this cotton had been sold and that the proceeds were in the Treasury. He came to Congress in that year; and from 1868 till the present time he has been here in the sense of having been trying to get his money, except that in the mean while, he having died, his legal representative has come into the case.

So that these twenty-two years of apparent laches are only five years, two of which were during the war, and three of which were during those unhappy years which followed the war when fruitless attempts were made to obtain the right others had had under the limitation of the law to go before the courts—to have his day in court and have his case decided.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these are the facts. I hold the papers in my hand. Here is the report to the Secretary of the proper officer of the Treasury saying 2,180 bales of cotton on those steamers were brought into Memphis.

Mr. SPRINGER. What was the amount that was realized from them?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Four hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars, of which there has been paid out for 1,164 bales of cotton which aggregated $225,000, leaving in the Treasury $196,000. Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to submit there is not one dollar of that money which belongs to the Government of the United States?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Not a dollar.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Not a dollar. There is not a dollar of it which it owns in equity or law. It is purely a trustee—a trustee for a man who is not to blame. And now what pretense can there be that the Government of the United States having been the trustee of this money for a period of twenty-two years shall throw an obstacle in the way of the cestui que trust obtaining the money which he has laid out of without interest for a period of twenty-two years? I confess I know of no rule which ought to separate morality and honesty upon the line of sovereignty—that when you draw the line between sovereign government and the private citizen there ought not to be a line which divides it from morality and justice so that the Government shall not pay its honest debts according to what is lawful and proper to a private citizen. I know of no reason except the mere fiction which we have inherited from our ancestors that a sovereignty ought not to be and can not be sued. For one I would like to see the American Government set an example to its citizens of a fair and legal submission of all these claims to an honest tribunal which it creates according to its law.

In addition, sir, I submit if this case goes to a tribunal to be decided and that tribunal decides, first, that this cotton did in good faith belong to that dead man; second, that it was seized by the Federal Government; third, that it was sold; fourth, that the money is in the Treasury; and fifth, that the Treasury holds it as trustee, why then should the American Congress want any other step than that judgment is entered this trust money be paid according to this clear right? And that is all this bill asks. Why should we come back, or anybody be forced to come back to the American Congress to ask an appropriation to pay a judgment which ought to have been paid when the judgment was made, by which the money which the Government has held in the Treasury as trustee for eighteen month or two years or for twenty long years, without interest, shall be paid to the rightful claimant? As I understand it that is the case, and it seems to me it is one of the cases we can afford to let go to an American court of claims to be decided.

Mr. CULBERSON. I send up an amendment which I offer as a substitute for the pending amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the right of action under the provisions of the captured and abandoned property act be, and the same is hereby, revived and extended for one year from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the benefits of the foregoing section be, and the same are hereby, extended to those claimants whose claims have been adversely determined by said court upon the ground of disloyalty without taking into consideration the fact of the President's proclamation of pardon and amnesty.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I submit that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas is not germane, as it is in the nature of general provisions, while the pending measure is in its nature a private bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the gentleman to withhold his point of order until I can be heard on my proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the point of order will be reserved for the present.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose and, Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 831) for the relief of George A. Storrs, of Texas; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

ESTATE OF C. M. BRIGGS.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Chairman, there is a very important question involved in the consideration of the bill now before the House. The substitute which I have offered to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] provides that a right of action in the Court of Claims to recover the proceeds of sale of captured and abandoned property shall be revived and extended for one year from and after the passage of the act.

The second section of the substitute provides that the benefits of the first section shall be extended to all claimants whose suits were adversely determined without giving proper legal effect to the executive proclamations of pardon and amnesty.

The bill under consideration extends the right to C. M. Briggs only to bring a suit in the Court of Claims to establish his right to a portion of the money now in the Treasury and held there as the proceeds of the sales of captured and abandoned property. There are over $10,000,000 in the Treasury belonging to this fund. I submit a statement, which I believe to be correct, taken from a statement found in the case of Hodges vs. United States, 18 Court of Claims, page 700:

Whole amount of abandoned and captured property sales		$31,722,466 20
Cost of collecting, sale, and other expenses	$6,551,000 00
Transferred to Freedman's Bureau	243,000 00
Internal-revenue taxes and commercial intercourse fees	1,406,000,00
Released to claimants by Secretaries Chase, Fessenden, and McCulloch	2,550,675 24
		10,750,675 24
Balance covered into Treasury under resolution of March 30, 1862		20,971,790 96
Paid on special acts of relief	$290,906 32
Paid on judgments against Treasury agents	64,557 27
Paid on judgments under act of March 12, 1863	9,883,423 16
Paid by Secretary of the Treasury under act of May 18, 1872	195,896 25
Disbursed for expenses under joint resolution of March 30, 1868	75,000 00
		10,459,783 00
Balance in Treasury		10,512,007 96

To whom does this large sum of money belong? It found its way into the Treasury under the acts of Congress authorizing the sale of captured and abandoned property. There is no question more fully settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court than that all the money represented by the balance of this fund, which was realized from the proceeds of the sales of property belonging to individuals, is the property of the original owners of the property seized and sold by Treasury agents. The seizure and sale of the property did not divest the title of the original owner to the proceeds of the sale. Upon the contrary, the Government took possession of such property, converted it into money, and placed the money in the Treasury for the purpose of preserving it, subject to the disposition provided for by the act. How was this fund to be disposed of? It was provided by the act of 1863 that any person claiming to be the owner of any of the property seized and sold by the Treasury agents might prefer his claim in the Court of Claims to the proceeds thereof at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, and on proof to the satisfaction of the court of his ownership of said property, of his right to the proceeds thereof, and that he had never given aid or comfort to the rebellion, should be entitled to recover such proceeds.

It is plain, therefore, that so much of this fund as had been realized from the sale of property belonging to loyal claimants belongs to such claimants, and the Government holds it as a trustee subject to the claim, when established, of the rightful owner.

What disposition was to be made of the proceeds of the sale of property which had belonged to persons who had given aid and comfort to the rebellion?

The act of March 1863 also provided that the proceeds of the sale of property belonging to disloyal persons should be placed in the Treasury and kept there subject to such action as the President might take under the act of 17th July, 1862.

What action did the act of 1862 authorize the President to take? Among other provisions the President was authorized at any time thereafter by proclamation to extend to persons who may have participated in the rebellion in any State or part thereof pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he should deem expedient for the public welfare. The Government did not see fit to confiscate either the property belonging to disloyal persons seized under this act or the proceeds of the sale of such property, but the proceeds were to be held subject to such action as the President might deem wise and proper under the act of July, 1862.

The President understood the full scope and purpose of the act of 1862. He deemed it expedient and humane to use this property to induce disloyal owners to return to their allegiance to the Government of the United States. He was authorized by the Constitution and by the act of 1862 to use it in that way, and every department of the Government is bound by his action.

On the 8th day of December, 1863, the President of the United States issued his proclamation in which he expressly referred to the act of 1863 relating to captured and abandoned property, and offered pardon and amnesty with restoration of all rights of property except as to slaves and property to which third persons had acquired rights to all persons who had participated in the rebellion (with some excepted classes) who would take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and abide by the laws.

On the 29th of May, 1865, another proclamation was issued extending pardon and amnesty with a full restoration of all rights of property except as to slaves and property to which third persons had acquired rights to all persons who had participated in the rebellion, excepting such persons as were embraced in fourteen classes named in the proclamation. A similar oath was required.

On the 7th of September, 1867, another similar proclamation was issued by the President reducing the number of excepted classes from fourteen to three. Finally, on the 4th day of July, 1868, a proclamation was issued which granted pardon and amnesty to all who had participated in the rebellion, with full restoration to all property rights except as to slaves. No oath was required.

It will be remembered that Congress in 1867 repealed so much of the act of July, 1862, which, as I have said, authorized the President to grant amnesty and pardon upon such terms as he might deem expedient, and for this reason some doubts have been expressed as to the validity of the proclamation issued by the President in July, 1868. But as the Supreme Court, in Klein's case, 13 Wallace, has decided that the repeal of the act of July, 1862, did not impair the authority of the President to grant pardon and amnesty to all who had participated in the rebellion, I suppose such doubts are no longer indulged by any one. What was the legal effect of these several proclamations of pardon and amnesty? I submit the following from the decision of the Supreme Court in Padelford's case, 9 Wallace:

> In the case of Garland this court held the effect of a pardon to be such "that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense;" and in the case of Armstrong's foundry we held that the general pardon granted to him relieved him from a penalty which he had incurred to the United States. It follows that at the time of the seizure of the petitioner's property he was purged of whatever offense against the laws of the United States he had committed by the acts mentioned in the findings, and relieved from any penalty which he might have incurred. It follows further that if the property had been seized before the oath was taken the faith of the Government was pledged to its restoration upon the taking of the oath in good faith. We can not doubt that the petitioner's right to the property in question at the time of the seizure was perfect, and that it remains perfect, notwithstanding the seizure.
> But it has been suggested that the property was captured in fact, if not lawfully; and that the proceeds having been paid into the Treasury of the United States the petitioner is without remedy in the Court of Claims unless proof is made that he gave no aid or comfort to the rebellion. The suggestion is ingenious, but we do not think it sound. The sufficient answer to it is that after the pardon no offense connected with the rebellion can be imputed to him. If, in other respects, the petitioner made the proof which, under the act, entitled him to a decree for the proceeds of his property, the law makes the proof of pardon a complete substitute for proof that he gave no aid or comfort to the rebellion. A different construction would, as it seems to us, defeat the manifest intent of the proclamation and of the act of Congress which authorized it. Under the proclamation and the act the Government is a trustee, holding the proceeds of the petitioner's property for his benefit; and having been fully reimbursed for all expenses incurred in that character, loses nothing by the judgment, which simply awards to the petitioner what is his own.

It, therefore, seems clear that the Government has no claim whatever upon this fund, and that it belongs as a matter of right to those whose property was seized and sold. Nobody ever disputed the right of a loyal claimant to recover the proceeds of the sale of his property upon proper proof. And unless the solemn, humane, and considerate proclamations of the President of the United States from 1863 to 1868 are to be held of no effect, and the decisions of the Supreme Court declaring the legal effect of these proclamations are to be disregarded, the right of a disloyal person to recover the proceeds of the sale of property which belonged to him is equally indisputable and clear. He was restored to his rights of property.

I submit the whole of the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Pargoud against the United States (13 Wallace).

> We have recently decided in the case of Armstrong against the United States that the President's proclamation of December 25, 1868, granting pardon and amnesty unconditionally and without reservation to all who participated directly or indirectly in the late rebellion relieves claimants of captured and abandoned property from proof of adhesion to the United States during the late civil war. It was therefore unnecessary to prove such adhesion or personal pardon for taking part in the rebellion against the United States. The judgment of the Court of Claims dismissing the petition is reversed.

This case settles the question fully. It was not necessary for the claimant to prove that he had been loyal to the Government, nor was it necessary to show a personal pardon for participating in the rebellion. His guilt had been condoned and his property rights restored by the proclamation issued in 1868.

Why has this fund remained in the Treasury so long?

Under the provisions of the act all suits to recover any of the proceeds of the sale of captured and abandoned property were required to be brought within two years after the suppression of the rebellion. When did the war close or when was the rebellion suppressed? The Supreme Court decided in the Anderson case, 9 Wallace, that for judicial and legislative purposes it must be held that the war closed and the rebellion was suppressed throughout the United States on the 20th day of August, 1866. On that day the President of the United States had issued a proclamation declaring the suppression of the rebellion throughout the United States.

All suits for the recovery of the proceeds of captured and abandoned property were required to be filed within two years after the suppression of the rebellion. It follows, therefore, that no suit of this character could have been instituted in the Court of Claims after the 20th of August, 1868. Some claimants who had participated in the rebellion filed suits in the Court of Claims before the bar of limitation was complete, but a large majority of this class of claimants did not institute suits, because it was generally understood that notwithstanding the proclamations of pardon and amnesty the claimant would be required to establish his loyalty. It was not known, certainly, among the people of the South, where for the most part this class of claimants resided, that the necessity of proving loyalty in order to get a standing in the Court of Claims had been removed by the proclamations of pardon and amnesty until 1869, when the decision of the Supreme Court declaring the legal effect of these proclamations was made.

The decision of the court came too late to benefit this class of claimants. The question now is, whether in view of all these facts Congress will refuse to open the door of the court to all claimants alike of this fund and allow them an opportunity to establish their rights to this money. Will the statute of limitation be invoked by the Government of the United States to justify the appropriation of this fund, which is private property, to public use without compensation? Over twenty millions of the proceeds of captured and abandoned property have been paid to individuals. The presumption that most of them were loyal must be indulged, because but few persons who participated in the rebellion have been allowed to establish their rights in this fund. Nearly all of the ten and a half millions remaining in the Treasury belonging to this fund must be the property of Southern claimants.

They never had an opportunity to bring suit until the close of the war in August, 1866, while the loyal claimant had access to the court from 1863 to 1868. These Southern claimants accepted the conditions of the Executive pardons and have faithfully abided by the laws. The Government promised them restoration to their rights of property, and it can not afford to break the pledge by covering this fund into the Treasury upon the operation of a statute of limitation. There are some circumstances connected with these claims which appeal most strongly to the magnanimity and high sense of justice of Congress. Treasury agents swarmed over the Cotton States upon the close of hostilities, and in many instances seized cotton to which the confederate government never had a shadow of right even, and which, so far from being abandoned property within the meaning of the law, was in the actual possession of the owners.

The condition of the country between August, 1866, and August, 1868, the want of information and the impoverished condition of the people, ought to be considered in determining this question. I have no objection to the claim of the applicant in this bill, but I object to this measure because it is special relief. I do not think that this applicant has any more claims for relief than others.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CULBERSON. I have only a few minutes of time remaining.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want to submit to the gentleman from Texas whether his proposition for general relief ought not stand alone, and be considered separate and apart from a bill affording individual relief.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think not. I am afraid you would not vote for a Texas claimant standing alone.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is a very violent presumption. I will vote for this bill, but not for your amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think the time has come when this trust fund should be surrendered by the Government to its proper owners; and I will not support any measure which does not provide a remedy for all claimants alike.

During the remarks of Mr. CULBERSON the following proceedings occurred:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will be permitted to continue. I ask unanimous consent that he may proceed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I yield such time as I may be entitled to to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas a question, whether there is not already a bill pending exactly like his substitute?

Mr. CULBERSON. That is a question of fact which I suppose can be proved.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I insist on the point of order, that the substitute is out of order from the fact that it is public legislation offered as an amendment to a private bill, and also because there is a bill now pending the proposition of which is almost identical with the gentleman's substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I want to say, even if the substitute was not out of order, I believe it is wrong to undertake to destroy the rights of individuals by attempting to postpone and defer and get rid of the bills granting them relief by substituting bills attempting to inject general legislation into them. The rule on that subject was made for that purpose, among others, that matters of legislation should be considered separately and alone and by themselves.

I would like to say further, that it seems a very strange proceeding to me that amendments of this character should be offered to a bill, and the House of Representatives asked to pass them. That expresses a lack of confidence in the decisions of the courts of the country. We submit a case to the court, and then we come here and in the very same bill in which we do so we say, "We have no confidence in the judgment of the court, and the court must come back with its judgment to the House of Representatives and have that judgment confirmed before it is allowed to enter it."

Then it is another strange proceeding that after the Congress of the United States have passed laws by which the property of citizens of this country was taken charge of and sold and the money put into the Treasury, another Congress comes right along behind it and says that the law by which that money was put there was not a good law; saying, in substance, "Now that we have got your money there we are not going to restore it, but are going to keep it." I know, Mr. Chairman, there are gentlemen in every Legislative Assembly who constitute themselves special guardians of the Treasury. They take delight in having it said they voted "no" against this proposition and against that proposition and against the other proposition. Well, Mr. Chairman, if a reputation has got to be built upon doing injustice to any citizen or any class of citizens, I for one do not want any of that kind of reputation.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another phase of this subject. A howl was raised in the country that if a Democratic administration should be inaugurated the raids on the Treasury on account of Southern claims would be beyond endurance. I want to call the attention of the House to this fact, that while men from the Southern section of the country, men who were, if you please, disloyal to the Government, are advocating the passage of this bill and those like it, this is not a bill to reward disloyal men or to pay disloyal people, but it is a bill to pay the claims of the people who were loyal and who were adhering to the Government of the United States when that word "disloyal" became so rife in the country; that it is not so-called Southern claims that are being presented, but the claims of loyal people asking for the money that belongs to them.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the House, as I understand it, proposes to provide for the adjudication of a claim for money held in the Treasury in trust for the benefit of the owners. The amendment offered by my colleague simply proposes to enlarge the operation of that principle so as to embrace all persons who are the owners of this money which thus remains in the Treasury as a trust fund under the decision of the Supreme Court; so it seems to me that the point of order is not well taken. I do not care to go beyond the point of order and discuss the question presented by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], but it seems to me that the amendment offered by my colleague is in order, because it is germane to the bill, and simply extends the operation of the rule proposed by the bill from one private citizen to another private citizen, from one private claimant to another private claimant.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rule XXI, clause 4: No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, has any one stated that there is a general bill pending embracing the substance of the amendment offered by my colleague?

The CHAIRMAN. That is one of the points made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], that the amendment is the substance of a general bill pending. The Clerk will read from the Digest on this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

An amendment proposing to ingraft a general provision of law upon a private bill is against order [Journal, 1, 31, p. 784]; or having the effect to convert a private into a public bill, or vice versa. [Journal, 1, 48, pp. 761–762.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is obnoxious to both points of order, and they are sustained by the Chair. The question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that all debate upon this amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] called attention to the fact that a bill embracing claims amounting to a very large sum has just been laid aside here to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. That bill embodies claims to a large amount, claims for property taken by the quartermasters and commissaries for the support of the Army, and under the law which authorizes such claims to be adjudicated the parties are required to prove their loyalty and to show that the property was actually taken and used by the Government of the United States for the support of the armies of the United States. That is the basis upon which such claims are audited. They are of various amounts, generally very small——

Mr. ROWELL. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. In a moment. These claims, I say, are some of them very small. For instance, on page 47 I see a claim for $11.25; another is for $115; another is for $200, and so on. Many of them are small claims, yet the aggregate is, as the gentleman has stated, somewhere about $250,000. The bill embracing these claims has generally been passed by the House without objection, because it comes to us under all the safe guards of existing law as to proof of the claim and proof of the loyalty of the claimant, and after thorough examination by agents of the Government. In fact, we have had no opportunity to investigate these cases in the House; we are compelled to take them upon the reports of the auditing officers of the Treasury Department. But that is not this case. This bill involves an entirely different principle. This is a claim for property captured in the midst of the war, in 1863—captured as abandoned property and sold and the proceeds put into the Treasury of the United States. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has shown that if this case goes to the Court of Claims as the bill stands now without amendment the question of loyalty will not be in issue and, under the decision of the Supreme Court, can not be put in issue, the amnesty proclamation of the President having wiped out all disloyalty.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Do I understand the fact to be that in the prosecution of this claim in the Court of Claims by Mr. Briggs or his representatives proof of loyalty will not be required?

Mr. SPRINGER. Under the decision of the Supreme Court which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has cited the question of loyalty would not and could not be in issue there.

Mr. CULBERSON. I state that that is the law as decided by the Supreme Court—that the fact of loyalty or disloyalty is not an issue in such cases, because the proclamation of the President in 1866 removed the necessity of proving loyalty.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to lose the floor, but I yield it for a moment.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have an answer to my question. I understand that the Court of Claims also required proof of loyalty under the act of 1863, and this is simply an extension of that jurisdiction, so that whatever was required to establish a claim under that law would be required to establish it under this bill.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. That is correct.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the Supreme Court has decided, under that very law, that the question of loyalty is not one of the issues to be inquired into by the court.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken about that.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] stated.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is a fact that prior to the decision of the Supreme Court in 1867 the Court of Claims did require proof of loyalty in all suits under the act of 1863. But in 1867 the Supreme Court decided that it was not necessary in an application of this sort and under that statute to prove loyalty. Why? Because the President's proclamation of pardon and amnesty had put all the people of this country on the same footing in that respect.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. In the presence of the legal gentlemen here I express any opinion as a lawyer with very great diffidence, especially in opposition to so distinguished a lawyer as the gentleman from Texas. But my apprehension of the decision referred to does not accord with his statement. The Supreme Court decided, according to my recollection (I have not lately examined the matter critically), that the act of Congress which undertook to make the plea of the President's pardon inadmissible was unconstitutional—not that the loyalty of the claimant did not have to be proven. But Congress having undertaken to say that the plea of pardon, if set up, should not avail, the Supreme Court declared that provision unconstitutional for two reasons: First, because it undertook to limit the unlimited constitutional right of pardon; and, secondly, because it undertook to interfere with the judicial department by determining the effect of a plea in cases that might be pending. I say, with great deference to the opinion of the gentleman from Texas, that I have no recollection of any decision of the Supreme Court which held that the claimant under this act was not required as an original proposition to prove his loyalty.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand, in the first place, the committee has reported that this man was loyal; that fact has been ascertained. But in the second place, I desire to say that the Supreme Court in the case cited did not decide that where the statute required proof of loyalty as a jurisdictional question the requirement was unconstitutional, but did decide what my friend from Kentucky has stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has expired.

Mr. REAGAN obtained the floor, and said: I propose to yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield to my colleague [Mr. EDEN].

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment of my colleague is in the line of precedent in respect to claims of this character. When the people of the South were permitted to present their claims against the Government of the United States which originated during the war a special tribunal was created, being denominated, I believe, the Commissioners of Claims. Proof was made before that commission showing the loyalty of the claimant and the justice of the claim, and that commission reported its findings to Congress, which, upon the evidence presented by the commission, allowed or disallowed the claim as the justice of the case might seem to require. I think it would not be advisable now to depart from the rule which has been followed in reference to claims of this character ever since the close of the war. Therefore I favor the amendment offered by my colleague.

I have not recently examined the decision of the Supreme Court referred to by the gentleman from Texas, but according to my recollection the decision is to the effect that upon these claims proof of loyalty is not required. Placing this claim upon the same footing as other claims that Congress has recognized coming from the people of the South, I think a safe rule will be to submit it to the Court of Claims to find the facts, and then let Congress take action upon the case.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I wish to state, for the benefit of gentlemen who are discussing this question of loyalty, that we are perfectly willing the loyalty of Mr. Briggs should be tried.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES], the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, if he has had occasion to examine the subject, has ascertained that the amount of money covered by claims of this character pending before Congress largely exceeds the amount of money applicable to their payment still remaining in the Treasury.

Mr. GEDDES made a gesture of assent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the gentleman to answer in the affirmative. These claims have been pending for many years. Congress for some time permitted this fund to remain in the Treasury under the control of the Treasury Department, but finally passed a bill covering the money into the Treasury; so that for all practical purposes the action of Congress declared this money to be a portion of the public funds. I am not aware that any bill of this class has passed Congress for some years except under very peculiar circumstances, presenting some reason for the delay which does not ordinarily arise.

I can very well see how the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] should at first blush have insisted with earnestness that a party who has been denied a hearing in a court of justice in behalf of his claim may well demand such right from Congress. But in answer to that it appears that the measure as to claims of this class growing out of captured and abandoned property was not simply a limitation of two years, but operated, if the statement of the gentleman from Texas is correct (and I have no doubt of its accuracy), for some time after the termination of the war, extending into the year 1867.

So, then, whether that limitation was fair, reasonable, and just, the fact still remains there was quite an interval of time during which loyal citizens of the United States had the right to go into the Court of Claims and have their claims adjudicated for property so taken and held by the Government. Therefore it can not be said the Government has denied the right of hearing in behalf of their claims.

But it has been said there was sufficient excuse on the part of this claimant for the delay in seeking that tribunal during the interval allowed under the law. If that excuse be ample and sufficient in the judgment of Congress, then it seems to me this claim should be allowed; and I presume the only question here at all is as to the justice of that limitation. I take it for granted, as has been already stated by gentlemen well informed, this is of that class of claims readily proved, and the only reason why it is not paid is because it is barred by statute. That brings us precisely to the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. It will be remembered that under what is known as the Bowman law it was deemed necessary to make the question of loyalty a matter going to the foundation of jurisdiction—a jurisdictional fact—the express limitation being placed upon the court to take cognizance of no case until that was adjudicated and made clear. Under that law, sir, the Court of Claims was required to make inquiry into the facts of the loyalty of the claimant and to satisfy itself of his loyalty before assuming to take jurisdiction of the case.

Now the committee will see the pertinency of that provision of the Bowman law in view of the statement which has been made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. Nor has the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] felt justified in controverting the proposition laid down by the gentleman from Texas, or saying that no inquiry should be instituted into the reasons prescribed under the third section of the Bowman act. That provision was placed there to meet the very case presented by the gentleman from Texas, and therefore this committee will see the importance of the case presented, not only in view of the magnitude of the amount involved, but also in view of the absolute justice on the part of Congress to treat all of these claimants with equal-handed justice, so that when a similar proposition shall be presented to-morrow or next Friday, it shall have precisely the same disposition as shall be made of this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my colleague will allow me a few minutes longer.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HOLMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield to the gentleman for that time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think on the point already made that all the facts touching this claim should be before Congress. If, then, it is apparent that in all likelihood the delay was clearly excusable, and if excusable this party ought to have a hearing, and, if proved, paid for his claim. And that is my point—was the delay excusable? Congress, treating all these claims alike, should take that fact into account when it removes the bar in the statute of limitations. It seems to me what the gentleman from Kentucky has the right to ask on the part of Congress is a report to Congress by the Court of Claims under the Bowman law of the reasons why the claimant in this case did not avail himself of the interval of time in which he had a right to a hearing and adjudication of his claim before the Court of Claims. To that extent Congress can go with safety. If, then, the Court of Claims shall report, as is believed by gentlemen will be the case, that the claimant was a loyal claimant, and that there was reason for his delay in going to the Court of Claims during the time he had the right to do so, then undoubtedly this House will be glad of the opportunity to pass the necessary bill of appropriation to pay the claim. I think my friend from Kentucky should ask for nothing more than that, and therefore I hold in my hand a proposition simply to substitute what is known as the Bowman law, with direction to the Court of Claims to inquire in addition and report to the House the circumstances connected with the delay, so that Congress can act fully on the subject. I trust my friend will not say that Congress will unnecessarily delay action after such a report has been submitted to it. I can say to him that prior to 1863, when the Court of Claims submitted the facts to Congress for its determination, there was not any delay on the part of Congress to appropriate the requisite amount of money to meet the adjudication of the Court of Claims where the claim was proper and ought to be allowed.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana this question: Whether there is any good reason why this claimant should be compelled to go into the Court of Claims under the Bowman act, which was passed years after his partners had gone into the Court of Claims and under its judgment had been paid out of the Treasury for their share of the loss under this same transaction? When a portion of this money has been paid out of the Treasury under one act of legislation, is it right, or proper, or just to deny to another claimant in reference to the same transaction the right, under the same privileges, before the same tribunal, to the hearing to which he is entitled? Can the gentleman give any reason why the right of one man should be adjudicated under one species of legislation and the right of another of exactly the same character be tried under another?

Mr. HOLMAN. The only answer to that is that the party now claiming did not deem it proper to avail himself of the opportunity presented to him under the law for the adjudication of his case.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. In answer to that, I wish to say I have tried to make it plain this claimant was ignorant of his rights under the law, and it was no fault of his that he did not take advantage of the opportunity to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I simply ask to have the syllabus of the decision of the Supreme Court, which has been referred to in this case, read for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

The act of March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. at Large, 820), to provide for the collection of abandoned and captured property in insurrectionary districts within the United States, does not confiscate or in any case absolutely divest the property of the original owner, even though disloyal. By the seizure the Government constituted itself a trustee for those who were entitled or whom it should thereafter recognize as entitled.

2. By virtue of the act of 17th July, 1862, authorizing the President to offer pardon on such conditions as he might think advisable, and the proclamation of 8th December, 1863, which promised a restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, on condition that the prescribed oath be taken and kept inviolate, the persons who had faithfully accepted the conditions offered became entitled to the proceeds of their property thus paid into the Treasury on application within two years from the close of the war.

3. The repeal, by an act of 21st January, 1867 (after the war had closed), of the act of 17th July, 1862, authorizing the Executive to offer pardon, did not alter the operation of the pardon or the obligation of Congress to give full effect to it if necessary by legislation.

4. The proviso in the apppropriation act of July 12, 1870 (16 Statutes at Large, 285), in substance * * * is in conflict with the views expressed in paragraphs 1, 2, and 3, above, and is unconstitutional and void; its substance being that an acceptance of a pardon without a disclaimer shall be conclusive evidence of the acts pardoned, but shall be null and void as evidence of rights conferred by it, both in the Court of Claims and in this court; it invades the powers both of the judicial and executive departments of this Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire consent to withdraw the amendment that I have offered, and will yield to the gentleman from Indiana, who will offer one to take the place of it simply covering the point in a different manner.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection the gentleman from Illinois will have consent to withdraw the amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Court of Claims is hereby given jurisdiction to hear and determine, under the act of March 3, 1883, entitled 'An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government,' the claim of the personal representative of C. M. Briggs, deceased, for the proceeds of cotton now in the Treasury of the United States, upon petition filed in said court at any time within two years from the passage of this act, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding; and that said court ascertain and report to Congress the cause of delay in the presentation and prosecution of said claim."

Mr. HOLMAN. The only effect of the substitution of this amendment for the other is that it opens up the statute of limitation—removes the bar—but at the same time instead of making the jurisdiction of the court final, as in the original act organizing that court, it provides that the facts ascertained by the court on this investigation shall be reported to Congress, including the cause of delay in the presentation of the claim. In that clause of the amendment I think lies the whole case. It is one which I am satisfied will appeal to the sense of Congressional justice as to whether or not this party should have the right to adjust his claim, as against others, upon the ground of an excuse ample and sufficient.

I think my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], in view of the history of these claims in late years, will admit that reasonably fair justice at all events, if nothing more, is done by allowing the claimant in this case to come in and present his claim, and by removing the bar of the statute of limitations for that purpose. That accomplishes a great deal, in my opinion, and that much I am willing to concede. In everything else this amendment is simply the bill before the House, except it requires that proceedings shall be had under the Bowman act, instead of under the act of March 12, 1862, and the subsequent act of July, 1864.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the syllabus of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States vs. Klein, just read, accords with my recollection, as stated on the floor a few moments since, namely, first that the disloyalty of a claimant, under these circumstances, did not work a confiscation of his property or divest him of title; second, that the President's power to pardon carried with it the full rehabilitation of the party to all his rights in property so seized and paid into the Treasury, and, third, that the act of Congress was unconstitutional and therefore void. But to settle any doubt upon that question, as I do not desire that any shall be entertained, if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is voted down I shall then offer this as an amendment, to be added to the original bill:

Provided, however, That the loyalty of C. M. Briggs, he being the original claimant, shall be established.

That adopted, there will then be no question possible.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think my friend's proposition will hardly be sustained if the views expressed by the gentleman from Texas are correct.

But I desire to call the attention of the committee to the amendment I have offered, which provides for the consideration of this claim by the Court of Claims under the Bowman act.

Mr. ROWELL. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the court shall also report whether C. M. Briggs and the party from whom he derived title were loyal citizens of the United States during the years from 1861 to 1866.

Mr. ROWELL. It seems to me that in providing for information upon which the House may intelligently act, if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is adopted, we ought to find out whether the original owners of this cotton were in that position that if they came before the United States court they would get pay for it. I do not think that a disloyal man, a man known to be disloyal, can transfer his property into the hands of a loyal man and have any better right to have a judgment against the United States in the person who bought it than the original owner had.

I am opposed to all of these amendments, because a judgment in the Court of Claims against the cotton fund authorizes the payment of the money out of that fund without an appropriation by Congress. I think any man who can climb the hill of the Court of Claims with a war claim on his back is very well entitled to have his money. I think it is more difficult to get along there than it is to get along here. I do not see why, having provided a court, if we pass a bill properly guarded, we ought to be afraid to let the Court of Claims decide whether there is any money in the Treasury of the United States as a trust fund that belongs to the claimant.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the amendment to the amendment be again reported.

The proposed amendment to the amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think if the gentleman from Illinois has considered the Bowman law he would see his proposition is not necessary, for that court can not take jurisdiction of the case until the fact of loyalty is established.

Mr. ROWELL. Is it not true that it is only the fact of loyalty as to the claimant that is provided for, and not as to the party from whom he derived title?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no; it covers the whole ground. I have no objection, however, to the gentleman's proposition.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment as amended was again read.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment as amended, there were—ayes 44, noes 62.

Mr. EDEN. I make the point that a quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SPRINGER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 44, noes 121.

So the amendment as amended was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. ROWELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:
"Provided, No judgment shall be entered unless it shall affirmatively appear that C. M. Briggs and the person from whom he derived title were loyal citizens of the United States during the years from 1861 to 1866."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I intimated a few moments ago that I proposed to offer an amendment. It does not go quite so far as the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL]. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois by striking out the words "and the person from whom he derived title," or I will move my amendment as a substitute for his.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will be satisfactory. It provides simply that the loyalty of Mr. Briggs and of the person from whom he obtained his title shall be established.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:
"Provided, however, That the loyalty of C. M. Briggs shall be established."

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand there is no question about the loyalty of the gentleman from whom the cotton was purchased by Mr. Briggs.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. When that question was asked me before I said I was not prepared to give a decided answer. I said we had no doubt of the loyalty of Mr. Briggs; but as to the loyalty of Governor Morehead I stated, with absolute frankness, that I knew nothing about it, not having seen him from before the war until his death. I stated also that he was arrested by the Government early in September, 1861; that he was released from confinement and went to Europe soon afterward and remained there until the close of the war. I am not familiar with Governor Morehead's private history during the war.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I had understood the gentleman from Kentucky to assert that Governor Morehead had claimed to be a loyal man. The question arises as to whether or not this was a negotiation entered upon with a view to avoid confiscation of cotton which belonged to Governor Morehead. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois ought to be satisfactory. In other words, the question is raised as to whether this was not a transfer from a disloyal man to a loyal citizen with a view to avoiding the penalty that might attach to disloyalty. It is to prevent that that this amendment is suggested.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If the point suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] were proposed to be put in the bill I would accept it, but the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois does not cover that point, because Governor Morehead may have been disloyal and yet the transaction may have been one entered into in good faith and not with a view to avoid confiscation.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understood the gentleman to assert that Governor Morehead claimed from first to last to be a loyal citizen.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. So I understood. But there is no mode by which his testimony can be obtained by the Court of Claims. I do not know how the fact of his loyalty can be proved. The point that it should be a transaction made in good faith may be entirely proper.

The transaction, if it is a sham, ought not now to receive the indorsement of Congress. Therefore, if I were in charge of the bill, I would accept an amendment, if the gentleman would frame it, providing that there should be proof that the transaction was made in good faith.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. If the trade was not made in good faith, we do not want the man paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] as a subsitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL].

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, before the question is put, I ask that the fourth section of the Bowman act may be read from the Clerk's desk for the purpose of throwing some light, as I think it will, upon this case.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. In any case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of the military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom such supplies or stores were taken, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States; and the fact of such loyalty shall be a jurisdictional fact, and unless the said court shall, on a preliminary inquiry, find that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom the same were taken as aforesaid, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war, the court shall not have jurisdiction of such cause, and the same shall, without further proceedings, be dismissed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I know that gentlemen who have heard that section read perceive exactly the object of it, that object being to evade the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court by making the fact of loyalty jurisdictional, and providing that that fact should be established before the court could take jurisdiction of the case at all. Gentlemen will see, therefore, that any proposition which simply requires proof of loyalty does not reach the case. The question is whether the court shall take jurisdiction until the fact of loyalty is established. For this reason I thought I was justified in appealing to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] not to press his amendment, because it is not important, in view of the provisions of law just read. The House can act safely upon this subject only by adhering to the law, which was carefully considered in the House and debated over and over again, not only here, but also in the other end of the Capitol, with a view to this very point.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman that there are two amendments already pending.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I am now prepared to submit my amendment, which I send to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Provided, however, That the loyalty of C. M. Briggs shall be established, and that his purchase of the cotton claimed to have been purchased by him was purchased in good faith.

Mr. EDEN. Do I understand, Mr. Chairman, that there are two amendments now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment just offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is offered as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL].

Mr. EDEN. Then my amendment will be in order as an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] offers his amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL].

Mr. EDEN. But have I not a right to offer an amendment to the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer his amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]?

Mr. EDEN. No, sir; I offer it as an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the vote must be first taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], and then the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] will be in order.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] be again read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add the following: "Provided, That no judgment shall be entered unless it shall affirmatively appear that C. M. Briggs and the person from whom he derived title were loyal citizens of the United States during the years from 1861 to 1866."

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, and the amendment was declared rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] which has just been read.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the Committee of the Whole did not understand that they were voting on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote was taken on that amendment.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. But that was not the amendment which was read.

The CHAIRMAN. After the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky had been read a gentleman on the left asked that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois might be read. The Chair directed that to be done, and then the vote was taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PETTIBONE. We thought we were voting on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky to be read again and the question will be again taken.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That the loyalty of C. M. Briggs shall be established, and that the cotton claimed to have been purchased by him was purchased in good faith.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 61, noes 80.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] which will be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, No judgment shall be entered unless it shall affirmatively appear that C. M. Briggs and the person from whom he derived title were loyal citizens of the United States during the years from 1861 to 1866.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move pro forma to strike out the last clause of this amendment. I wish to say a word to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] who submits this proposition. If the Supreme Court has decided, as I understand it has—and it was so understood when the "Bowman bill" was passed—that if we give jurisdiction any provision touching the subject of loyalty does not operate—if such is the decision of the Supreme Court, ought not the gentleman to provide by his amendment, as was provided in the Bowman law, that the court shall not take jurisdiction of the subject-matter until the loyalty of the claimant within the period named shall have been established?

Mr. ROWELL. I would be willing to modify my amendment in that manner; but I think it now covers exactly the same legal proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman holds that view after having studied the decision of the Supreme Court, which has been so much discussed in this House, then I do not press the suggestion. But if he has not studied that decision, I submit to him whether it would not be far safer to make the question of loyalty a jurisdictional fact rather than to offer the amendment in its present form.

Mr. ROWELL. I think the legal effect is the same.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. If I understand the effect of this amendment it forbids the payment of compensation for this cotton unless both the vender and the vendee were loyal; and this without regard to the question of good faith between these parties. I presume the gentleman who has offered this amendment is undertaking to act upon the fact that he knows one of these parties was loyal. Now, suppose the most loyal man in the country had in perfect good faith purchased goods from a disloyal man and paid value dollar for dollar, and subsequently those goods were destroyed. In that case, according to this amendment, such a loyal man could not receive compensation for his goods, because the person from whom he innocently purchased them was disloyal. This statement, it seems to me, is sufficient to show conclusively the folly of such an amendment, and to show how far party prejudice or passion, subsisting long after the war, will lead men in legislation. If the question is one of good faith, why not so frame the amendment as to make compensation dependent upon the good faith of the purchaser, the man who is to be recompensed by this legislation. Why propose to put upon the statute-book an act which would be a shame upon the men who passed it and an outrage upon those who come here to seek relief? If the object is simply to compensate loyal men and to punish the disloyal, the question of good faith should be confined to the purchaser; and we have nothing to do with any disloyalty that may have existed on the part of the vender.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment; it was merely formal.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ROWELL, there were—ayes 99, noes 64.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, 34 voting therefor; and Mr. ROWELL and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 67.

So the amendment of Mr. ROWELL was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee rose informally, when a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

ESTATE OF C. M. BRIGGS.

The Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar resumed its session.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I offer the following amendment, to come in immediately after the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after "1866," the following:
"And that the cotton grew on loyal ground, was picked by loyal hands, and was itself loyal."

[Laughter.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURROWS. I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That unless the said court shall, on a preliminary inquiry, find that said Briggs and the person from whom he derived title were loyal to the Government during the period aforesaid, the court shall not have jurisdiction of this case, and the same shall, without further proceedings, be dismissed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that if the principle of the Bowman law, a well-considered measure, is applied here, it seems to me it is going as far as it is proper for us to go. That part of the gentleman's amendment which requires the proving of title on the part of the person from whom the property was acquired, a thing not required under the Bowman law, in my opinion, should not be required in this case. Not being required under the Bowman law, it should be omitted here.

Mr. BURROWS. That is already provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know it is; but let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the House may see proper to adopt your amendment and refuse to adopt the amendment to which it is an amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. My amendment to the amendment simply provides that the party named in the bill and the person from whom he derived title shall, in the preliminary inquiry, be shown to have been loyal to the Government during the period mentioned before the Court of Claims can take jurisdiction in the matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will suggest that the two amendments will go to the House, and the House may finally reject the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and leave the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan standing. As the amendment applies the principle of the Bowman law to the case before jurisdiction can be assumed by the Court of Claims, it seems to me that is going as far as we should go. Going as far as providing for their loyalty during the period of the war is going far enough for safety.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not see what harm there can be in it, and therefore I will let the amendment stand as it is.

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment to the amendment, and I ask the Clerk to read from the decision of the Supreme Court.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the case of Garland, this court held the effect of a pardon to be such "that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense;" and in the case of Armstrong's foundry we held that the general pardon granted to him relieved him from a penalty which he had incurred to the United States. It follows that at the time of the seizure of the petitioner's property he was purged of whatever offense against the laws of the United States he had committed by the acts mentioned in the findings, and relieved from any penalty which he might have incurred. It follows further that if the property had been seized before the oath was taken the faith of the Government was pledged to its restoration upon the taking of the oath in good faith. We can not doubt that the petitioner's right to the property in question, at the time of the seizure, was perfect and that it remains perfect, notwithstanding the seizure.

But it has been suggested that the property was captured in fact, if not lawfully; and that the proceeds having been paid into the Treasury of the United States, the petitioner is without remedy in the Court of Claims unless proof is made that he gave no aid or comfort to the rebellion. The suggestion is ingenious, but we do not think it sound. The sufficient answer to it is that after the pardon no offense connected with the rebellion can be imputed to him. If, in other respects, the petitioner made the proof which, under the act, entitled him to a decree for the proceeds of his property, the law makes the proof of pardon a complete substitute for proof that he gave no aid or comfort to the rebellion. A different construction would, as it seems to us, defeat the manifest intent of the proclamation and of the act of Congress which authorized it. Under the proclamation and the act the Government is a trustee, holding the proceeds of the petitioner's property for his benefit; and having been fully reimbursed for all expenses incurred in that character, loses nothing by the judgment, which simply awards to the petitioner what is his own.

These views require the affirmance of the judgment of the Court of Claims, and it is accordingly affirmed.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, if I understand it, the original law referring this case to the tribunal constituted by the country had a limitation and it had a prescription for the jurisdiction of that court, all of which related to the claimant and not to the line of title under which the claimant presented his claim. Now, it is known that innumerable claims have been presented to that tribunal, and the claimants have received their rights and been paid. The present claimant comes before Congress asking his claim may be so far recognized as that the statute of limitations may be removed and he may go before this same tribunal and have his rights ascertained and determined under the original law. Now, I apprehend nothing can be said against that proposition except as to the statute of limitations itself.

And here permit me to say this is not strictly a statute of limitation. That kind of statute applies between claims which are contested, claims in which one individual has a counter-claim against another. In this case the Government is a mere trustee for the fund. It does not assume to own the property, but has always assumed, on the contrary, the attitude of being willing at all times to pay over the proceeds whenever the proper claimant in a proper manner is allowed to intervene and present his claim properly authenticated. Hence it appears to me not only wrong in policy, but an absolute act of injustice, to impose upon this individual the restrictions which it is sought to impose by these amendments, restrictions and conditions not heretofore imposed upon the mass of claimants who have been allowed to go before that tribunal.

It seems to me that the whole question is not the imposition of new conditions and restrictions, but whether this man shall be entitled to have a hearing under the same law and before the same tribunal that the other claimants have gone before.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is not, strictly speaking, a statute of limitations. It is imposed by the Government for the sole purpose, not of barring claimants, but of avoiding the trouble and responsibility of holding such funds in trust; and therefore it is provided, that unless claimants present their rights before the Government within a given time, the claims are barred and cut off. This is done, as I have said, to avoid the responsibility and care attaching to the trust. The Parliament of Great Britain has held itself open for the adjudication of such cases for a hundred years, as to whether or not the beneficiaries of trust funds, from whatever source obtained, whether as abandoned war material or estates escheated to the Crown, should have the right of recovery; and there is no reason in the world why this or any other restriction should be imposed in the direction proposed by the amendment which is now presented, as well as by the one which has been already adopted by the committee. Hence, sir, it seems to me to be proper that the original tribunal, with its original jurisdiction in questions of this kind unchanged and unmodified, with the rules of evidence and the laws of title prescribed unaffected by any modern legislation, should be permitted to have full force in this case, so that this claimant may have his day in court and before that tribunal.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, if I understand what the word loyalty means, it means the observance in good faith of the Constitution and laws passed thereunder, as well as obedience to the decisions of the courts established under the Constitution upon those laws. The moving spectacle is presented here of one great branch of the Government making a fight upon the question of loyalty, when every act of theirs is disloyal to their own laws and to most of the decisions of their courts.

We have seen here, sir, by an act of Congress, an amendment put upon this bill, requiring not only the proof of the loyalty of the vendee, but the loyalty of the vender as well, when the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States vs. Anderson (9 Wallace, page 57) expressly decides that the question as to the loyaly of the vender can never become a question where the purchase was in good faith.

I quote from a part of the syllabus of the decision in that case:

> Under the act of March 12, 1863, commonly called the "abandoned or captured property act," it is not necessary for a party preferring his claim in the Court of Claims for the proceeds of property taken and sold under it to prove in addition to his own loyalty the loyalty of the persons from whom he bought the property taken and sold, the property having been purchased by him in good faith and without intent to defraud the Government or any one else.

And yet these magnificently loyal gentlemen, though their souls abhor all taint of disloyalty, stand here in the face of these decisions of their own Supreme Court and incorporate upon their own acts not only unjust but disloyal amendments to their own laws.

Now, what will you do when your courts have decided this question? Are you to affirm all established precedents? Are you here to declare that the Supreme Court of the United States is not competent to decide legal propositions, or that it is so disloyal that it can not be trusted in its decisions upon them? What great principle or what great interests are at stake in this little claim here that you should depart from these well-established legal precedents of justice and common honesty as between men? No human life is at stake. No liberty is jeopardized. But for a mere paltry sum of dollars and cents you are here under the party lash to pass laws that upturn all the precedents in the courts and overrule the decisions of your own Government, and to do that in the name of loyalty!

I know you are in a minority here.

Mr. STRUBLE. For the time being only.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. For the time being; and I trust for many long years you will be in a bigger or a still smaller minority, if I may so express it. [Laughter.] And I promise you that just a few acts of this sort of legislation will so arouse the country that perhaps the time will come when your minority will be so small that none of you will be here.

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to occupy but a few moments. I came into the House after this bill had been read and while the discussion was in progress. I understand the main question involved is whether the statute of limitations applying to this class of claims shall in this instance be removed so that this man may have a hearing in court.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I will correct the gentleman. The main question involved in this case is whether Governor Morehead, who is now dead and who sold cotton to an innocent purchaser, was a loyal man or not.

Mr. STRUBLE. If I understand correctly my colleague from Iowa [Mr. HALL] the point I have just stated was the main question or one of the main questions involved.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. That is correct.

Mr. HALL. The point made is this, that the condition should not be imposed upon a claimant not originally imposed upon him by the statute.

Mr. STRUBLE. That is not quite as I understood my colleague from Iowa when he was last on the floor. But I desire to make this point: If I am wrong as to the question involved it is because I have not heard the various propositions read. But if the proposition is to extend the statute of limitations, it seems to me that ought not to be done by a special bill. There are other bills of this character—I apprehend many hundreds of them—and if there is this large number it seems to me the question is important enough to demand the consideration of a general bill.

If a private soldier comes in here who has not filed his application for a pension in time to receive the benefit of the arrears act we say, "No, we will not grant your application by any special act." We regard that as a matter to be determined only by a general act. And so I say in this class of cases, if this be the question involved, we should not raise the limitation on any one case, but should consider the general question.

It may be replied that the question of pensions is not analogous, because pensions are a mere gratuity. We give these benefits to the soldiers. But in this case it is a question of the existence of property and of the right to that property. A limitation has been imposed by the statute. Now, shall that be raised by special act in this special case? Or shall we consider the proposition to raise the limitation with respect to this whole class of cases?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

The amendment was again read.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 95, noes 56.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the committee rise. It is near the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 77, noes 79.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs, Shall the bill be laid aside and reported to the House with the amendments?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. It was to make that motion that I rose.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now again move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had instructed him to report with amendments the bill (H. R. 989) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; and also, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 3828) for the relief of the estate of C. M. Briggs, deceased.

ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House.

The Clerk read as follows:

> A bill (H. R. 989) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any one of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House?

No separate vote was demanded; and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

C. M. BRIGGS.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 3828) for the relief of the estate of C. M. Briggs, deceased, with amendments.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House were read, and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 120, noes 22.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 28 members voting therefor—not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that when the House adjourns to day it stand adjourned until Monday next.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will that dispense with the evening session?

The SPEAKER. It will not. The House now simply takes a recess until half past 7 o'clock.

The motion of Mr. MORRISON was agreed to.

WAR TAXES AS A SET-OFF.

Mr. HEPBURN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the views of the minority on the bill (H. R. 3) to prevent the claim of the war taxes under the act of August 5, 1861, and acts amendatory thereof, by the United States, as set-off against States having claims against the General Government; and the same were ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit a report on a private bill.

The SPEAKER. From what committee?

Mr. MCMILLIN. The Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DUNHAM. What is the bill?

Mr. BEACH and others. "Regular order!"

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen call for the regular order.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening, under the order heretofore made.

The motion of Mr. HAMMOND was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes) took a recess until 7.30 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 7.30 p. m.

Mr. THOMAS S. PETTIT, one of the reading clerks, called the House to order and read the following communication:

To the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

Mr. MCMILLIN, of Tennessee, is designated to preside at this evening's session of the House.

JOHN G. CARLISLE.

Mr. MCMILLIN accordingly took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order under which the House meets.

The order was read, as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only be considered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WINANS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

CATHERINE COLLINS.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 613) for the relief of Catherine Collins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the regulations and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Catherine Collins, the dependent mother of John Collins, late of Company G, Eighth Veteran Reserve Corps, at the rate of $8 per month, commencing with the date of the death of said John Collins.

The committee recommended the following amendment:

Strike out the words "at the rate of $8 per month, commencing with the death of said John Collins," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "to commence from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to; and as amended the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

ELEANOR C. BANGHAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1582) for the relief of Eleanor C. Bangham.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll de novo, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eleanor C. Bangham, widow of John S. Bangham, late a private in Company M, First Regiment New York Light Artillery.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1582) for the relief of Eleanor C. Bangham, submit the following report:

That it appears from the papers now on file in the Pension Department that John S. Bangham, the husband of claimant, was mustered into the service of the United States March 26, 1864, in the First Regiment of New York Light Artillery. That for the months of March and April, 1864, he was reported on the muster-roll of the regiment as sick in field hospital at Bridgeport, Ala.; that June 14, 1864, he was discharged from the hospital and ordered to report to his company; that afterward he was part of the time with his company and part of the time was sick in hospital at Bridgeport and Savannah, Ga.; that afterward, and on or about June 23, 1865, he was mustered out of service with his company at Rochester, N. Y., not on account of disability, but by general order; that he died at his home in Niagara County, New York, September 10, 1873.

That the claimant was allowed by the Commissioner of Pensions, about June 24, 1879, at the rate of $8 per month, commencing September 10, 1873, and continued to receive the same till about June, 1885, about which time notice having been given to the Pension Department that the husband of the claimant was subject to epilepsy before his enlistment, an examination was had under the direction of the Pension Department, the claimant being present at such examination, and thereafter the name of the claimant was stricken from the pension-rolls.

From the evidence before us we have no doubt but claimant's husband was subject to epilepsy at the time of his enlistment, but in so mild a form that he was able to perform manual labor, and that the same did not materially interfere with his occupation; that after being mustered out of service with his company and while in the service the disease had materially increased, and the frequency and severity of these epileptic attacks was increased.

We think that the evidence reasonably shows that the labors and privations incident to the service tended to produce or contribute to this result, and that inasmuch as the United States retained him in its service for fifteen months, and until his company was mustered out at the close of the war, it is no more than just that the Government should grant a pension to his widow, whose husband's death was clearly hastened by the privations and hardships of the military service of the United States.

Your committee, after due consideration of all the papers in the case, are of the opinion that the name of the claimant should be restored to the pension-roll, and therefore report favorably on the bill and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AMY A. LEWIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1579) for the relief of Amy A. Lewis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Amy A. Lewis, widow of J. H. Lewis, late of the Twelfth Battalion New York Light Artillery.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RACHEL NICKELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 925) to amend an act entitled an "Act granting a pension to Rachel Nickell," approved March 3, 1885.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That an act entitled "An act granting a pension to Rachel Nickell," approved March 3, 1885, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Rachel Nickell, mother of Asbury Nickell, late of Company I, Forty-seventh Regiment Kentucky Mounted Infantry."

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

The act approved March 3, 1885, reads therein, "Rachel Nickell, widow of Asbury Nickell," when the proof in pension claim of Rachel Nickell, No. 233883, shows that Rachel Nickell was the mother of Asbury Nickell, said Asbury Nickell being at the time he was killed by the rebels a single and unmarried man.

Your committee is of the firm opinion that the word "wife" was incorporated in said act by mistake of the draughtsman, and, finding the claim a meritorious one, they recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES W. MINNIX.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 934) granting a pension to Charles W. Minnix.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles W. Minnix, late a private in Company I, Fourteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

G. W. FRALEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 929) granting a pension to G. W. Fraley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of G. W. Fraley, late a private in Company C, Fortieth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers.

Mr. CRISP. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

George W. Fraley enlisted as private in Company I, Fortieth Kentucky Volunteers, August 20, 1863, and served in said company until about November 23, 1863, when, in Morgan County, Kentucky, while in the said service and in the line of duty during an engagement in battle, he was thrown from his horse and seriously injured in the back and privates, from which he has been a constant sufferer ever since, and in consequence of which he is unable to labor for his support.

He applied for pension November 28, 1879, and his claim was rejected on 26th day of June, 1883, "upon the ground that there is no record and no medical testimony showing treatment in service nor since for alleged injury to back and privates.

The evidence of quite a number of the officers and privates of his company and regiment, as well as the nurse in the hospital where he was kept, show that he was sent to and remained in the hospital for a considerable length of time receiving medical treatment, and that he was afterward sent to the Soldiers' Home, at Louisville, Ky.

The report from the Surgeon-General's Office shows that he was being treated in hospital in December, 1863, at Mount Sterling, Ky.

The evidence shows that he was sent from Mount Sterling, Ky., to Grayson, Ky., in January, 1864, and that both the surgeons who treated him are dead.

The records of hospital at Grayson, Ky., are not on file with United States Surgeon-General.

The evidence clearly establishes the fact that he was a healthy man when he entered the Army, and that he is now disabled from injuries received while in the service of United States and in line of duty.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LEWIS A. THORNBURY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 928) granting a pension to Lewis A. Thornbury.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lewis A. Thornbury, late a sergeant in the Thirty-ninth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES T. CASKEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 936) granting a pension to James T. Caskey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of James T. Caskey, late a private in Company G, Forty-fifth Regiment Kentucky Mounted Infantry, subject to the provisions and limitations of existing pension laws.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE SLACK.

The next business on the Private Calender was the bill (H. R. 1836) granting a pension to George Slack.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of George Slack, late a private in Company C, Eighty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll at the rate of —— dollars per month from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill strike out the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of —— dollars per month from and after the passage of this act" and insert "subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. WOLFORD. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) was read, as follows:

The claimant, George Slack, a citizen of Brown County, Ohio, respectfully represents that during the late war he was a private in Company C, Eighty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and served faithfully from the 1st day of August, 1862, up to — day of May, 1865, when he was honorably discharged from the service and mustered out with his regiment at that time.

That while in said service, and when in the line of duty, he was injured in a railroad collision on the Knoxville and Chattanooga Railroad near Cleveland, Tenn., and in which collision his right ankle was broken and very much injured otherwise. Claimant was then taken to the hospital at Cleveland, Tenn. This occurred on the 5th day of November, 1864. Claimant at that time was on detached duty from hospital at Chattanooga, and at the time of receiving said injury claimant was in the company of strangers, none of whom he ever knew, and none of whom belonged to his regiment. Claimant remained in the hospital at Cleveland, Tenn., from that time to the — day of March, 1865, during which time he was cared for and treated for his said broken ankle by the surgeon in charge, Dr. M. Meredith, who now resides at Vinton, Iowa.

Claimant was on the said — day of March discharged from said hospital and joined his regiment at Goldsborough, N. C., yet claimant's injured ankle was still much swollen and very weak, and so continued until he was discharged, and for a long time thereafter, and has continuously been weak, and at times painful and swollen, and to a great extent cripples and disables him. During the time claimant was in said hospital he was with entire strangers, none of whom he had ever met before. Claimant now recollects of the names of but two persons who were in said hospital, to wit, William Near and Joseph Hood, but does not and can not remember their address, or the regiment to which they belonged. Therefore claimant can not and is unable to furnish the testimony of any comrade, soldier, officer, or citizen of or concerning the receiving of said injury, or of his treatment while in said hospital.

Claimant has written to Dr. M. Meredith, the surgeon who had charge of said hospital, for testimony concerning the same, and has secured from him a statement that all the records of said hospital from November 1, 1864, up to March, 1865, were destroyed, and that therefore no record, information, or evidence could be furnished of or concerning the patients in said hospital during that time.

Dr. Meredith writes to claimant that he has no distinct or personal recollection of his case, although he does distinctly recollect of several injured soldiers being brought to said hospital in November, 1864, and treated for fractures and injuries received in railroad collision near that point.

Claimant has filed the statement of Dr. Meredith in Pension Office, as evidence on his application for pension No. 309782. Declaration for a pension was filed to the Commissioner of Pensions, but the same was rejected on the 14th day of September, 1885, on the grounds that claimant failed to furnish satisfactory evidence that the alleged injury was received in the service or line of duty.

Claimant has furnished full and ample proof of each and everything necessary to entitle him to a pension, save and except the matters referred to, and claimant now refers to his application for pension, evidence and affidavits of witnesses now on file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, and makes the same a part of this petition.

On account of his treatment in said hospital with strangers, and on account of the destruction of the records of said hospital, he is unable to furnish the evidence required by the Commissioner of Pensions, and he can not furnish any evidence upon that point, only his own affidavit and the affidavits of comrades, as to the condition of his ankle when he joined his regiment in March, 1865, and as to its weak and crippled condition from that time to the present.

Claimant, therefore, prays that by special act of Congress he be granted a pension, and that he be placed upon the pension-rolls of crippled and disabled soldiers of the United States of America.

We therefore recommend that the bill do pass, with an amendment, striking out all after "pension-roll," in sixth line, and adding "subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NATHANIEL TAYLOR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1568) granting a pension to Nathaniel Taylor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nathaniel Taylor, late a private in Company L, Fifty-sixth New York Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALICE S. HOLBROOK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1084) granting a pension to Alice S. Holbrook.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Alice S. Holbrook, daughter of James S. Holbrook, late of Company E, Twenty-ninth Massachusetts Volunteers.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add to the bill these words: "and pay her a pension of $18 a month."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DANIEL CONNOLLY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 225) granting a pension to Daniel Connolly.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Daniel Connolly, late of Company K, Second Regiment Connecticut Artillery Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. MARTHA E. TURNEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 226) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Turney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Martha E. Turney, widow of James M. Turney, late a private in Company H, First Regiment of Connecticut Cavalry, in the late war of the rebellion.

Mr. STRUBLE. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 226, beg leave to submit the following report:

Martha E. Turney is the widow of James M. Turney, late a private in Company H, First Connecticut Cavalry. He died July 15, 1882, leaving an unfinished claim in the Pension Department, application No. 310594, alleging disability from sunstroke in the service and line of duty while acting as cook at Stoneman Hospital, Washington, D. C., on or about August, 1864. She filed a claim for widow's pension July 28, 1882, and prosecuted his unfinished claim until March 23, 1883, at which time the same was "rejected upon the ground that the alleged disability originated prior to enlistment."

The evidence in the case shows that the soldier was subject before enlistment to what he called bilious headaches, which he suffered from once or twice a year only, and that he always relieved himself from them by a course of physic. From this fact is largely built the theory upon which the rejection of the case was had. He enlisted November 25, 1863, and was discharged August 2, 1865. Claimant, being on detached service, was unable to furnish the evidence of a commissioned officer or of enlisted men of his company as to incurrence in service and line of duty. Nor does he remember the names of any of those who were present at the time he was prostrated.

The evidence in the case is as follows:

George S. Cooley, neighbor of claimant, swears:

"He knew him many years prior to his service in the First Connecticut Cavalry, and knows up to the time of his enlistment he was a sound, able-bodied man, and always in good health; that often in summer, in the hottest of weather, he would go into the hay-field, without detriment or inconvenience; that he never had an affection of the head or any ailment or any tendency about the brain to disable him from work; that he saw him on his arrival home from the Army, when he was a very changed man; he had a look about his eyes of a man who was suffering from some nervous excitability—prostration and exhaustion. He seemed feeble; was laid up at his home and unable to work for the better part of two years; easily overcome by his exposure to the sun, and suffering greatly in hot weather. Claimant and himself removed to Bridgeport about 1869, and he has seen him often since and knows his susceptibility to attacks of brain affection in hot weather or any overtask is marked; that he is a man not able to earn his living by manual labor, and that he is now (1879) of general feeble health."

James Baldwin, M. D., in his affidavit, says:

"Knew claimant well; was his family physician for many years previous to his enlistment; was regarded by him as a man of sound health, and without any of the pain of head or nervous affections to which he has since been subject; claimant's habits good."

J. B. Morehouse, late captain of claimant's company, testifies:

"When claimant enlisted he was to all appearance a sound and healthy man; that claimant was some time prior to August 1, 1864, under superior orders, detailed as chief cook of Stoneman Hospital, Washington, D. C.; that he was continued on such detail, and did not return to his company during his service."

Robert Hubbard, M. D., late surgeon of the Seventeenth Connecticut Volunteers, testifies:

"Some time on or about August, 1864, claimant appeared before him, showed him his hospital furlough, and on account of his condition he gave him his certificate of claimant's unfitness for duty for about ten days; that at the time of said application he examined claimant, and was satisfied from his appearance that he was suffering under effects of partial sunstroke or some consequence of that nature, from being overheated, producing nervous sensitiveness and marked cerebral disturbance."

Francis J. Young, M. D., testifies:

"Been family physician of claimant since 1871, and every season in hot weather has been called to attend him for violent headaches and a tendency to brain hyperæmia; that upon overheating or exertion he has been prostrated and entirely incapacitated for work. His opinion is that the same is result of sunstroke or overheating, which he believes he contracted in the service."

Zarah J. Tirrell testifies:

"He knows claimant well for thirty years; that he saw him on his way to his regiment after enlistment when he passed through Baltimore, where affiant was on duty, and he saw him when he started for the front, about March, 1864; he was up to this last-mentioned date and through all this time of affiant's knowledge of him a sound and healthy man. Some time this summer of 1864 he left this regiment as a dismounted soldier and went to a dismounted camp, he supposes Camp Stoneman, where affiant saw claimant during the summer at the hospital as cook for the officers and surgeons' mess, and afterward heard that he had had a sunstroke at said Camp Stoneman, and remembers that after his attack, perhaps after his furlough home, they tried him on duty, thinking he could do it, but he failed, as he was too feeble. About February 7, 1865, he met claimant again at Harper's Ferry, where he was acting as sergeant, calling the roll and issuing rations for about a dozen men, but as the men came in thicker he had to give up his sergeant's duties; was feeble and had to attend surgeon's call every day. They remained together at Harper's Ferry till after April 14, 1865, when they left for Washington and Chapel Point on the Potomac, and he is sure claimant was there in camp hospital for his ailment. Affiant had charge of the sick men at both Harper's Ferry and Chapel Point, and remembers claimant as receiving treatment. Affiant knows him there to a few days of his own discharge asailing, feeble, broken down, and off duty at all times after he saw him at Camp Stoneman."

The character of the whole evidence shows him to have been a constant sufferer from his disability down to the time of his death, before which time he became insane. He was treated in the hospital at Bridgeport, Conn., as late as April 17, 1882, three months prior to his death, and the evidence of S. T. Day, M. D., attached to hospital, is cumulative in the direction of the disability being effect of sunstroke or overheating. This claimant entered the service a sound and healthy man; he came out broken in health and enfeebled in constitution; his sufferings in the later days, from his disability, were so intense as to result in insanity and final death. Your committee are of opinion that his widow should be pensioned, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JEPTHA HORNBECK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 788) granting a pension to Jeptha Hornbeck.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jeptha Hornbeck, late a private in Company I, One hundred and fifty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN PRUITT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4835) to place the name of John Pruitt on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of John Pruitt, formerly of Company H, Tenth Kansas Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 721) to place the name of John Pruitt on the pension-roll, submit the following report:

Your committee find that this soldier enlisted in Company H, Tenth Kansas Volunteers, November 21, 1861, and was discharged September 3, 1864. On the 17th day of October, 1870, he made application for pension, alleging disability from frozen feet, received on January 3, 1864, near Nevada, Mo. This application was rejected on the ground that this disability was not incurred in the line of duty. The facts of this case, as appear from the testimony submitted, seem to be as follows:

On or about January 3, 1864, while on a march with his company from Fort Scott, Kans., to Sedalia, Mo., the claimant and a comrade obtained permission from a lieutenant of the company to leave the command for one night in order to visit some relatives who lived about three or four miles off the line of march, with the understanding that they were to rejoin the command on the following morning at a point farther along the route. While going to pay the proposed visit the claimant and his companion lost their way in a furious snow-storm, which obscured the roads, and the result of the exposure then endured was the freezing of his feet, and the disability on account of which he claims the pension. He subsequently made application for pension on account of diseased eyes, which is not satisfactorily sustained by the evidence. The man is now totally blind, has lost a part of both feet, is very poor, and has a large family.

Your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ISAAC CHENOWETH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1352) granting a pension to Isaac Chenoweth.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isaac Chenowith, late first Sergeant of Company F, Thirtieth Regiment Missouri Enrolled Militia.

Mr. DOCKERY. The name of the beneficiary in this case is incorrectly spelled in the title and in the body of the bill. It should be Isaac Chenoweth, instead of Isaac Chenowith. I ask unanimous consent that this typographical error be corrected.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FREDERICK BOTTJER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 777) granting a pension to Frederick Bottjer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frederick Bottjer, late a private in Company I, Eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. AMY A. HURST.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3538) granting a pension to Mrs. Amy A. Hunt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Amy A. Hunt, widow of Oliver P. Hunt, late a sergeant of Company B, Forty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

The amendment reported by the committeee was read, as follows:

In the title and the body of the bill strike out "Hunt" wherever it occurs and insert "Hurst."

Mr. STRUBLE, I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

We find that claimant is the widow of Oliver P. Hurst, late sergeant of Company B, Fortieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers. This soldier enlisted August 22, 1861, and was discharged September 7, 1864. October 30, 1868, he made an application for a pension, alleging that he contracted rheumatism and chronic diarrhea at Sharpsburg about September 20, 1862. He died September 22, 1874, of rheumatism of the heart. The widow filed an application for a pension, which, with the soldier's application, was rejected, on the ground that the disability was not due to the service. The hospital records show that he was once treated for intermittent fever and once for bilious fever.

Capt. B. Q. A. Gresham testifies, under date of July 30, 1881, that "Hurst also complained a great deal of suffering from rheumatism." Afterward, in reply to office letter, June, 1884, affiant claimed that he knew nothing of his being sick. The regimental surgeon, Dr. Beck, testifies that he treated him in service for rheumatism, he thinks, but can not recall the particulars.

G. A. Nelson. J. Charley, and E. Weltz testify that he contracted rheumatism at Arlington, Va.

J. Bowman and J. D. Elliot testify that they knew this soldier before and after enlistment; that he was a sound, rugged man before, and that ever after his discharge he suffered from rheumatism and diarrhea.

Silas D. Coffey testifies:

"In the spring of 1863 he was an inmate of the convalescent camp near Alexandria, Va., and while there, about the month of March or April of said year, he became acquainted with Oliver P. Hurst, who was said to be a member of Company B, Third Indiana Cavalry, who was also an inmate of said camp for a week or two; that while remaining at said camp said Hurst was apparently very feeble, and complained of rheumatism; that said Hurst left said camp for his regiment, and affiant saw no more of him until after the close of the war; that about the year 1866 or 1867 he again met said Hurst in Clay County, Indiana, and at that time he was still feeble, to all appearances, and was still complaining of rheumatic trouble."

Joseph R. Grable also testifies that he was at same convalescent camp; that Hurst remained there two weeks, unable to travel, and that he complained of rheumatism.

His wife, son, and daughter testify that he was afflicted with rheumatism when he came home, and that his hands and joints were swollen from the effect of that disease.

James Bowman and George Brandenburg also testify that they were intimately acquainted with him before and after enlistment; that he was well and strong when he entered the Army, and suffered with rheumatism from time of his discharge until his death.

Dr. W. B. Brown says:

"I became acquainted with Oliver P. Hurst in the year 1867, and that he was laboring under chronic rheumatism of a severe grade, and that he continued afflicted with the same for five years or until 1872, when he moved from the neighborhood."

Dr. Levi A. Hale says:

"I became acquainted with him in the year 1869, as to his disease, only by observation and conversation. I was familiar with him, and found him suffering with chronic rheumatism to such an extent that he was disabled from his trade."

Dr. C. J. Jenkins testifies:

"He treated said soldier professionally for chronic rheumatism, affecting the heart, from March 29, 1874, to September 22, 1874; that said Oliver P. Hurst died of said disease of chronic rheumatism at the county of Richmond and State of Illinois on the 22d of September, 1874; that said soldier was almost an entire invalid and helpless, and totally incapacitated from performing manual labor by reason of said disease from about October, 1873, continuously to the date of his death."

This case was placed in the hands of a special examiner, who took the evidence of a large number of his neighbors and comrades (during the month of May, 1885), nearly all of whom testified that they never heard him complain of rheumatism after he came out of the service. They all agreed that he was a very strong, active man before he entered service, and most of them could not recollect that he appeared differently when he returned from the Army. It is difficult to reconcile evidence so contradictory. That he served three years in the Army; that he was several times sick during that time; that from 1867 till 1874 he was a constant sufferer from rheumatism, and that on the 22d of September, 1874, he died from that disease, seem to be established. That his widow is now in destitute circumstances is also shown.

Without calling in question the action of the Pension Department in rejecting the case, your committee would recommend the passage of the bill with the amendment that wherever the name "Hunt" occurs it shall be "Hurst."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Louisa Noland, widow of Augustus Noland, late a private in Company F, One hundred and ninety-sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALBERTINE COCKRUM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 116) for the relief of Albertine Cockrum.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Albertine Cockrum, widow of E. B. Cockrum, late a captain in the Missouri Home Guards, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. CRISP. Let the report be read.

The report by (Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 116) for the relief of Albertine Cockrum, having given the same due consideration, report as follows:

This case was considered by the House Committee on Invalid Pensions at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress and the following report made thereon, namely:

"Albertine Cockrum is the widow of E. B. Cockrum, late a captain in the Missouri Home Guards. Captain Cockrum derived his authority to perform military duty from an order of Brig. Gen. John Sanborne, then commanding the district of Southwestern Missouri, with headquarters at Springfield, Mo. By the terms of this order Captain Cockrum was authorized to scout with his home-guard company a section of the district in which he resided, driving out all bands of guerrillas and keeping the peace of that section of country, without compensation from the Government. The records in this case show that Captain Cockrum was at the time he received his death-wound in the district assigned to him for duty and engaged in protecting loyal citizens, preserving the peace of the country, and defending and maintaining the Government against those in armed rebellion, and that he was in the line of duty at the time he received the wound which caused his death there is no doubt.

"Captain Cockrum was killed in action with the confederate troops at Buffalo City, Ark. There is no question as to the cause of his death or the manner of it. He was attacked by the enemy, and while fighting bravely on the 21st of April, 1864, received the wound which caused his death. He never enlisted, however, in the service of the United States, but as captain of the company of home guards referred to was authorized to do duty in behalf of the United States. The claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that claimant's husband was employed as a civilian, and that her application was not prosecuted to a successful issue prior to July 4, 1874. Proof of the service of the soldier is shown by the Adjutant-General's report, wherein he shows that claimant's husband was granted permission to perform police duty with his company. His widow, the claimant, is quite destitute, and your committee recommend that the bill do pass."

Upon which report a bill in the exact language of the one under consideration passed the House of Representatives January 23, 1885.

Your committee, believing that the above report correctly sets forth the material facts in the case, adopt it and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SIDNEY SHERWOOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3387) granting a pension to Sidney Sherwood.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sidney Sherwood, late a private in Company E, Tenth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment submitted by the committee, to add the words "pension to be paid to his legally constituted guardian."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES MORGAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 618) granting a pension to James Morgan.

The bill was read, as follows:

William F. Martin's company, Second Battalion Veteran Reserve Corps Cavalry, and who was discharged the 27th day of July, 1865, at Annapolis, Md., by reason of a gunshot wound received in battle.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NEWTON O. BAKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1589) for the relief of Newton O. Baker.

Baker, of Lockport, N. Y., late of the Twenty-third Independent Battery New York Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

TIMOTHY PAIGE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1590) for the relief of Timothy Paige.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Timothy Paige, father of Wilkinson W. Paige, late captain of Company M, of the Tenth Regiment of New York Cavalry Volunteers, to take effect from the passage of this act.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I care for the reading of the report of the committee in this case. Its favorable character indicates that in the opinion of the Committee on Invalid Pensions the bill ought to pass, and that seems to be in the judgment of the House a sufficient reason for the passage of this and all other bills so reported.

I do desire, however, Mr. Chairman, in the short time I shall tax the patience of the House, to express my objection to certain legislation that is now pending on the subject of pensions, propositions which will be brought to our attention at an early day and on which, perhaps, I shall have no other opportunity to state the reasons for the vote I shall cast.

I am aware, sir, there are Representatives on this floor who believe certain other Representatives—Representatives from a certain section of this country, the section from which I come—should not be heard on questions of this sort. I can not submit to be controlled by their opinion as to the measure of my duty as a Representative, but shall pursue the course which meets the approbation of my own judgment. I believe, Mr. Chairman, it is the duty of this Government, as it is the duty of every government, to grant wounded and disabled soldiers of its wars reasonable and proper pensions, and I shall be found among those who vote for pensions to that extent. Now, sir, there has been upon the statute-books of this country for many years liberal provisions for the country's defenders. Whoever was wounded, whoever was disabled by sickness, is entitled under the law to be placed on the pension-rolls of the Government.

The pensions allowed are very liberal; there is in my judgment too much difference in the rates which are allowed, all the way from $1 a month to $100 a month. I believe that is not right; it seems inequitable, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions might properly give their attention to a revision of the allowances made to the various degrees of disability.

But, sir, the proposition to which I especially refer as coming at an early day before this House and which I desire to discuss are the bills to increase the pensions of widows of soldiers from $8 to $12 a month, and to remove the limitation act so that arrears of pension may be paid to all pensioners who are now borne upon the pension-rolls and who have not yet received arrears of pension.

I have said that in my judgment the present rule was liberal. Let us see if it is not, both as to the number of persons on the rolls and the amounts paid them. On the 30th of June, 1885, there were upon the pension-rolls, as appears by the report of the Commissioner of Pensions which has been recently handed to us, 345,125 pensioners. There are pending in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions 430,215 applications for pensions under the present law. The aggregate number of applications which have been filed for an allowance under the law as it now exists is 968,840. As I find from this report, the aggregate number of soldiers in the Union armies during the war between the States was 2,772,480. According to this statement, then, more than one-third of the soldiers who were engaged in the war have applied to the Government for pensions. Surely that must be conceded to be a liberal rule or statute which, not purporting to give "service pensions," yet entitles more than one-third of the entire force in the field to avail themselves of its benefits.

I am not now complaining, Mr. Chairman, of the law as it is; I am not now objecting to any man, who can show himself within the law entitled to a pension, obtaining it. I think, on the contrary, he ought to have it if he has been disabled by wounds or by sickness in the service of his country. My view of the question of pensions is this: Every government should extend liberal allowances to its soldiers and sailors who were wounded or incurred disabilities in defending it in the hour of its peril, and to the widows of those killed. Every government owes to the soldier who offers his life in its defense a debt of gratitude, but it does not always follow that you could or should liquidate a debt of gratitude in dollars and cents. Looking to our ability to pay (with a just regard to the other obligations resting on the Government, with a just regard to the great masses of the tax-payers of the country), the Government should extend a liberal allowance to its disabled soldiers.

How shall we determine what is liberal in such cases? We can not leave that question to the soldiers alone. It is our duty to consult the interest of all the people, having due regard to the plighted faith of the Government.

Now, sir, a prime factor in determining what allowance should be made to the soldiers of the country in the shape of pensions is the ability of the Government to pay. It can not be said, and I respectfully submit that the soldiers will not ask it, that the country should be bankrupted to pay them pensions. I submit it is not fair, and they should not ask that the great mass of the people should be tax-ridden in order that they might have a prodigal allowance out of the public Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, as illustrative of the liberality of this Government on the subject of pensions, let me cite some figures: There was paid last year out of the Treasury for pensions the sum of $65,693,706. Notwithstanding, sir, the last gun was fired in the war between the States nearly twenty-one years ago; notwithstanding, sir, that the pension laws at the close of the war were substantially as they are now, yet, sir, there has been from the inception of the system until to-day a steady increase in the expenditures for pensions. How do you account for that? With the exception of one year in the history of the Government there was more money paid last year than was ever paid for pensions in any one year since the system was inaugurated. Why is this? One would think that twenty-one years after a war the list would be materially less. Yet, strange to say, it has steadily increased. The aggregate amount of money paid out for pensions is so enormous as to be absolutely appalling. Without counting, sir, the expenses of the office here, without counting the expenses of the various special agents throughout the country, without counting expenses that aggregate, I am told, about $2,000,000 a year——

Mr. PRICE. Two and a half millions.

Mr. CRISP. Without counting these expenses, that aggregate two and a half millions, as I am told by the gentleman from Wisconsin, there has been paid out for pensions the enormous sum of $744,040,541.06. The present pension-roll, as I have said, is more than $65,000,000 a year, and there are almost as many claims for pensions pending to-day as have already been granted.

With these now pending, if they shall be allowed, then under the present law the pension-roll would be in the neighborhood of $125,000,000 a year. Is not that a liberal showing? Does not that exhibit a liberality approaching, if it does not reach, prodigality? And can any fair-minded man say, even though we pass no more pension laws, that this Republic has been ungrateful?

I am not now, sir, complaining of what has been done. I am referring to these facts to give you the reason why I am opposed at this time to an increase of widows' pensions, or to granting to the many thousands, who would be entitled under the law if it passed, arrears of pension, to date back to the time of the disability. There was an act passed in 1879 by the Congress of the United States—I may say a Democratic Congress, though, Mr. Chairman, this is not a political question; I do not so regard it; I am not now discussing it in that way; I am not saying what I do to elicit any man's unkind feelings, and I assure you, Mr. Chairman, and this House, that I have no feeling as to any individual in it, or as to any soldier in the country, that should prompt them to criticise what I shall say—an act passed granting arrears of pensions to the soldiers then on the pension-roll. The statement was made upon the floor at the time of the passage of the bill that thirty or forty or fifty millions at the outside would cover the cost. Now what did that act in fact take out of the Treasury of the people? Let me tell you. It took the sum of $259,873,972.96. I hear the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] in his seat saying that it cost something less than that. I will refer him to the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, which he will find sustains my statement; not a report properly but a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, addressed to Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, which I hold in my hand, in which he estimates the cost of the acts of January 25 and March 3, 1879, at $259,873,972.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman will allow me to correct him I will state if he will read the report carefully he will find the amount paid out already is $179,000,000. The other sum is the estimated cost including the future.

Mr. CRISP. That is very true. I thank the gentleman for calling attention to the fact. I did not intend to mislead. There have been paid out already one hundred and seventy-nine million and odd dollars. Of the number of applications for pensions still pending not passed on, and that may come under that act, the Commissioner of Pensions estimates that 60 per cent. will be allowed, and 60 per cent., if allowed, will take the amount of $80,468,100; and that, added to the amount already paid out, will be the sum I stated. The estimate of 60 per cent. is based upon the past experience of that Department, and I believe is a reasonable estimate of the number that will be allowed.

The Commissioner of Pensions having been invited by a committee of this House to express an opinion as to what will be the cost of the bill to increase the pensions of widows from eight to twelve dollars a month, as is provided in the pending bill, submits his calculation, which gentlemen have all seen. He makes the annual increase $6,106,922. He estimates that sum as the annual increase of the charge upon the Treasury by granting this increase of $4 a month to the widows who are now drawing $8 per month.

Now, sir, why should we put this increased burden on the great mass of the people? What reason has been or can be given for it? For years this has been the allowance to widows. Until recently no clamor was made for an increase; they seemed satisfied; the allowance was deemed liberal when made years ago, and it is much greater in its purchasing power now than it was then. In 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, and 1870, and even up to 1880, the purchasing power of money in this country was not nearly so great as it is now. There has, perhaps, been no time in the history of the country when $8 would buy more of the necessaries of life than it will buy to-day. There is no reason then in the increased cost of living. Is there any reason in the better ability of the Government to pay? For the first time in many years the reports of estimates from the heads of Departments, as to what our income will be and what our outgo should be, exhibit the fact that we may well expect to find ourselves face to face with a deficiency. I am indebted to Mr. Courts, the very efficient clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, for the following table, showing the estimated revenue for 1887 and also the estimates for appropriations presented by heads of Departments:

Amount of estimates of regular annual appropriations for 1887	$268,220,849 98
Amount of estimates of permanent annual appropriations for 1887	118,910,955 00
Total estimates of appropriations for 1887	387,131,804 98
Amount of estimated revenues for 1887	315,000,000 00
Amount of estimated postal revenues for 1887	47,542,252 64
	362,542,252 64
Excess of estimates of appropriations over estimated revenues for 1887	24,589,552 34

It would seem from this statement that there is nothing in the financial condition of the Treasury to indicate that larger allowances or outlays should be made for pensions now than were made ten years ago.

Permit me to say just here, Mr. Chairman, that it seems to me there is some duty resting upon this Government besides the duty, which I freely concede, of providing for the disabled soldiers. I understand, sir, that no government has a right to take from the people, in the way of taxation, one dollar more than is necessary for the economical and just administration of its affairs. There are in this country sixty millions of people who are compelled to bear the burdens of taxation and from whom comes every dollar that goes into our Treasury. The Government gets no money, and in the nature of things can get no money, except what it takes from its people. For every dollar that goes into our Treasury a like dollar comes out of the pockets of the people. Both parties in this House have pledged themselves to an economical administration of the Government. Both parties pledged themselves to a reduction of taxation. I will ask, Mr. Chairman, how is a reduction to be effected if this proposed legislation is to prevail?

By the bill repealing the limitation of the arrears-of-pension act, which seems, Mr. Chairman, to have many friends upon this floor, and which, if I mistake not, one of the political parties in caucus agreed they would pass——

Mr. STRUBLE. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the fact that when he states one party agreed they would pass such a proposition he is in error about that. My recollection is the caucus committed itself to the support of that proposition if it should come up in this Congress.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, of course I did not mean to be understood as saying that the political party to which I then referred had the power to pass the bill. They have not the majority of this House. But I only meant to be understood as saying that they pledged themselves to try and pass it, and thereby manifested the fact that they were in favor of its passage. Of course I have no right to criticise them or any individual for favoring its passage, but I propose to give the reasons why I shall oppose its passage, and if they do not commend themselves to the judgment of any other man but myself, to me, Mr. Chairman, they are fully satisfactory.

By that bill, which some members propose shall pass, the arrears-of-pension bill, there will be taken from the Treasury the sum of $303,836,200. Of that sum there would be an immediate payment of $84,468,000. If the pension-roll for the fiscal year ending in 1886 shall be as large and no larger than it was for the year ending in 1885, then you would have to add thereto the sum of $84,468,300, making about $150,000,000 to be paid during the next fiscal year for pensions, to be followed by a steady increase until we know not when. Besides, the estimated cost of the act of 1879 on this subject, the act allowing arrears, was only one-fifth of the amount that we now know will be required to pay the persons entitled to payment thereunder. If the same kind of estimates have been made on the bill before us as was then made, instead of this act costing about $300,000,000 it would cost five times that much. These estimates are necessarily uncertain and unsatisfactory, and experience has shown are almost always less, largely less, than the actual amount required.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that this Government, in justice to those who contribute the money that goes into the Treasury, is able to incur an expenditure of this sort. Are we never to have a reduction of taxation? Are we to continue extravagant appropriations, and thus necessitate the retention of our present unjust, inequitable, and oppressive system of taxation; how are we to relieve the distress of the great mass of our people unless we refrain from extravagant appropriations? Do you know any way to get the vast sums that will be required under these proposed laws except by taking it from the hard earnings of the people?

Let me ask gentlemen upon the floor who say they are in favor of a reduction of the taxes how the taxes are to be reduced unless the expenditures of the Government are reduced in the same proportion? Sir, if these bills should become laws we may bid a long farewell to the hope of reducing the revenues, to the hope of relieving the people, and may as well make up our minds at once that we must devise ways and means to obtain more money, for with what we have we can not pay the claims. I am aware, sir, that there are sections of this country whose people receive direct benefits from the payment of these pensions. I am also aware of the fact that there is another large section of this country impoverished by the results of the war, struggling to build up this waste places, doing all they can to mend their broken fortunes, that do not get one dollar of benefit from the expenditure of these large sums. I do not want to be misunderstood in this regard. I do not mention this as an argument to show that reasonable pensions should not be allowed, but I present it, claiming that it is a reason why prodigality should not continue.

Human nature is alike everywhere, Mr. Chairman. You see it illustrated every day on the floor of this House; you saw it illustrated to-day, sir; where a sum of money is to be appropriated to go to individuals in a particular State the Representatives of that State will be anxious for the passage of the bill. We had before us to-day a bill providing for the payment of certain claims—just claims, I have no doubt—a large number of which came from the State of my friend who sits before me [Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR]. Now that gentleman and every other gentleman from Tennessee seemed to feel a strong personal interest in the passage of the bill. Why? I presume the claims were just, but many other just claims have come before this House without eliciting so much interest on the part of gentlemen who were specially attentive to this bill. What influenced such action? Why, Mr. Chairman, it is that trait of human nature which prompts us to further by all means in our power any appropriation of money that is to be expended among our own people.

I criticise no man, sir, for entertaining that spirit or feeling; I do not pretend or claim to be above it myself. But I want to ask gentlemen who live in States that are directly benefited by the large sums of money that are paid out in pensions to consider the burdens of the people who live in other localities. I ask this, not with a view to parsimony, but I ask these gentlemen to consider, when the question of pensions arises, the people of other sections of the country, who do not derive any benefit from these expenditures, people who do not oppose liberal allowances to the disabled soldiers of their country, people who are willing to bear their just share of the necessary burden of the Government, but who do not think they should be taxed to make prodigal allowances to any one.

Take the pension-list to-day, and see the amounts that go to some of the great States. Take the State of New York, for instance. Eight or nine millions of pension-money is paid to its citizens every year. Take the State of Indiana; nearly five millions of this pension-money goes there. Take Illinois; more than five millions of pension-money goes there, and so proportionately throughout the Northern States.

These large sums of money thus being paid out of the common Treasury each year to the citizens of some of the States has a marvelous effect upon their general prosperity. It builds up their industries; it stimulates their business; it is just as if you increased the productiveness of those States to that extent; just as if you added to the great crops they already make so many additional million bushels of corn or whatever else they produce. Therefore it is, Mr. Chairman, that gentlemen who represent those States are perhaps likely to overlook the fact that all other parts of the country do not receive like benefits for these expenditures. Now, sir, we do not seek—when I say we, I mean the people whom I have the honor to represent—they do not seek to avoid any just burden that may be put upon them. They willingly contribute, even of their poverty, to whatever is necessary for the grandeur, the glory, and the justice of our common country. They are willing to pay whatever is necessary to deal in good faith and liberally with the soldiers of the country. But I submit, sir, the point of liberality being certainly reached, that it is not right to ask them to go further.

Mr. Chairman, the income of this country, the greater portion of it, is derived from customs duties and internal revenue; about $112,000,000 or $115,000,000 from internal revenue, and about $180,000,000 from customs; then adding revenue from all other sources, we have an aggregate of about $387,000,000 that comes into the Treasury every year. Upon that income there are many burdens. The Army must be sustained; the Navy must be supported; the public debt must be paid; the rivers and harbors throughout the country should be improved; reasonable pensions should be granted, and all other just claims against the Government must be paid. Now, sir, how are these burdens to be met? The receipts are now barely sufficient to meet them, and yet we are asked to add millions to the sum of our liabilities. We must, sir, increase taxation, increase the bonded debt unless we observe economy in the public expenditure. We do that in most cases that come before us; why should the matter of pensions be made an exception to the rule? It should not be. I protest against it, and as a Representative invoke at the hands of brother Representatives the same care and the same scrutiny and the same regard for economy in making appropriations for pensions as characterizes their actions in all other matters of appropriation that come before them.

I urge upon this House only reasonable economy, not parsimony. I would be just, I would be liberal in such matters, but I do think that there ought to be somewhere this side of utter ruin to the people a stopping place. If gentlemen can give any good reason why the allowance now made for pensions is not sufficient, if they can show any reason why it is more pressing to pass this bill now than it was fifteen years ago, if they can show any greater ability on the part of the Government to pay increased pensions now than it has had heretofore, then there might be some plausibility in the claim. But no such reason is given. It does not become me, sir, to impute, nor shall I impute, to any gentleman any motive for any vote or any act of his upon this question. I have no right to do so; I have no desire to do so. But I insist that we ought to have a reason given, and a good one, too, when we are asked to vote these vast sums out of the Treasury of the United States, when the people are already staggering under the burdens they bear, and, in many sections of the country, getting poorer and poorer each year.

Mr. Chairman, an illustration of the point I am now seeking to make is found here every Friday night. Is there another committee of this House whom the members of the House are willing to trust blindly except the Committee on Invalid Pensions? Is there any proposition to pay $20 that the Government owes—justly owes—which will be allowed to pass this House without the reading of the report? Now, in pension cases very often the report is not read, cases making a charge upon the Treasury of say $120 a year for many years to come. There must be some reason for this; what is it? The reason that strikes me with most force, if I may be permitted to pass judgment on the reasons of other people, is that a large number of members, perhaps most of those who attend the night sessions, believe that every man who was in the Federal Army ought to have a pension whether he is disabled or not; and therefore they do not scrutinize these cases with the care which they would apply if their views were different. Believing, as many of them do, that all these soldiers should be pensioned, they do not give these cases that nice scrutiny which they would apply if their convictions were different. They simply say to themselves, "He was a soldier; I think all such ought to be pensioned, and therefore I shall vote in favor of this bill."

I do not wish to be understood, Mr. Chairman, as reflecting or intending to reflect on the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I am fully aware that committee makes many adverse reports. Nor do I intend to reflect upon the members of the House; but what I am commenting upon is the singular fact that this House of Representatives, composed of three hundred and twenty-five members, is willing to accept blindly the judgment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and of no other committee of this House. We meet here every Friday night. We have to-night a fair sample of the number who usually come here. Why is it that the vast majority of the members of this House fail to attend the sessions held each Friday night for the consideration of pension bills? Do they feel no interest in the matter? I presume it is well understood that as a rule these sessions are attended only by members of the committee and by other gentlemen who are concerned in bills pending on the Calendar. When I say "concerned" I do not mean improperly concerned, but concerned by reason of having introduced the measures.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I think a similar sparseness of attendance would occur in any case if a particular time were fixed for the consideration of private bills of any character—any time when private bills alone would be considered.

Mr. CRISP. Private bills only were in order to-day, Mr. Chairman; yet we had a good attendance. The point was made that no quorum was present. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] who now occupies the chair occupied it then. He appointed tellers, and it was developed that there was easily a quorum in the House.

Mr. PETERS. We had something besides private bills.

Mr. CRISP. No, sir; I beg the gentleman's pardon. Friday is set apart under the rules for the consideration of private bills only.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. If a session were set apart for private bills of one particular character, as is the case with these sessions for pension business, I think the gentleman would find the attendance meager. But the bills liable to come up to-day are to a certain extent of every conceivable character.

Mr. LONG. And public bills are liable to come up on Friday if private business be dispensed with.

Mr. CRISP. I simply mention this matter, Mr. Chairman, to emphasize the idea in my mind that as to this one question of pensions, for some reason—what the reason is I do not pretend to say—the same scrutiny is not given that we give to legislation on every other subject coming before us. The support of the Army, the Navy, the great departments of the Government—the payment of the bonded debt—the payment of every other description of claim—elicit from members of this House the closest scrutiny, while pension claims seem to go through without objection, or, if objected to, are always passed by large majorities.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said all I desire to say and more than I intended. I wanted to go upon record against these propositions. I had no desire to wound the feelings of any gentleman in any way; and I trust I have not done so. I wanted to put myself upon record now, because I doubted whether I would be able to do so at a later period; I doubted my ability to get the floor on a future occasion; and I wished to place upon the records of the country my reason for casting my vote against both the propositions to which I have referred.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to lay before the Committee of the Whole a communication from General Black, Commissioner of Pensions, bearing upon a practical question now pending before Congress. I submit this letter, not because it applies particularly to this case, but because it contains statistics which ought to be presented to the country before we are called upon to vote on the extension of the arrears of pension and some other kindred questions. If measures of this kind are to be passed by this Congress it is of the utmost importance that we act upon the fullest statistical information attainable, so that there may not again occur what happened with reference to the last arrears act, the country having been confronted after the passage of that act with an expenditure far beyond what it had been claimed the act would cost.

Mr. CUTCHEON. As the document in question has been repeatedly referred to in the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] who has just spoken, and as it will be a great convenience to have the information in accessible form, I am glad the gentleman from Tennessee proposes to place it on the records of the House.

The communication referred to by Mr. MCMILLIN is as follows:

PENSIONS.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your recent request for a statement touching three propositions, as follows:

First. What has been the cost to the Government to date as the result of the passage of the acts of January 25 and March 4, 1879, extending the limitation in the filing of applications for pension, and what will be the probable expenditure under the operation of said acts without regard to the second proposition?

Second. What will be the probable cost if Congress repeal the limitation imposed by said acts of January 25 and March 3, 1879?

Third. What will be the additional annual value of the pension-roll should the pending bill (H. R. 545) become a law, which proposes to increase to $12 the monthly rate of all widows, minors, and dependent relatives, pensioners and applicants, whose monthly rate is or would be less than said sum?

The Commissioner desires it understood that, in submitting the accompanying figures absolute accuracy is not practicable, as any estimate on the proposition presented must necessarily be largely conjectural. He, however, submits them as the best which his observation and experience can suggest.

FIRST PROPOSITION.

The acts of January 25 and March 3, 1879, provided substantially that all pensions allowed thereafter for causes originating subsequent to March 4, 1861, should commence at the date of discharge in cases of invalid pension; and at the date of termination of the right of the parties having prior title, in all these classes, provided applications were filed prior to July 1, 1880.

Up to June 30, 1883, there had been expended in new allowances—that is, in cases unsettled at the passage of said acts—the sum of $105,205,682, which is properly chargeable to the operations thereof.

The total amount expended for pensions during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, was	$56,908,597 60
The annual value of roll was	34,456,600 35
Arrears paid and chargeable to said acts	22,451,997 25
The total amount expended for pensions during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, was	64,933,288 12
Annual value of roll	38,090,985 28
Arrears paid	26,842,302 84

Up to June 30, 1885, there was expended for the payment of arrears in cases allowed prior to January 25, 1879, in which the limitation ran against the dates of commencement; that is, in which the date of commencement was determined by the filing of the last essential evidence, $24,904,890.37.

RECAPITULATION.

Amount paid to June 30, 1883	$105,205,682 00
Amount paid to June 30, 1884	22,451,997 25
Amount paid to June 30, 1885	26,842,302 84
Amount to June 30, 1885, in cases on rolls January 25, 1879	24,904,890 37
Total amount expended to June 30, 1885, as results of acts January 25 and March 3, 1879	179,404,872 96

The number of applications for pensions filed prior to July 1, 1880, and pending July 1, 1885, was as follows:

Invalid claims	73,415
Widows and others	26,656

It is estimated that 60 per cent. of these cases will receive favorable consideration, so that the following figures will show approximately the amount required to pay the arrears therein consequent upon the passage of the said act of 1879, the average first payment in invalid cases being fixed at $1,500, and in widows' and other cases at $900:

60 per cent. of 73,415 = 44,049 × $1,500	$66,073,500 00
60 per cent. of 26,656 = 15,994 × $900	14,394,600 00
	80,468,100 00
To this add amount expended to June 30, 1885	179,405,872 96
Total cost of acts of January 25 and March 3, 1879	259,873,972 96

SECOND PROPOSITION.

If the limitation as to the filing of applications imposed by the acts of January 25 and March 3, 1879, be repealed, all pensions will commence at date of discharge or at the termination of "prior title."

Since June 30, 1880, there have been allowed 46,867 invalid pensions and 29,558 widows' and other pensions, in which, by reason of the limitation referred, no arrears have been granted.

Of the invalid allowances, 26,027 were filed in 1880; 4,812 in 1881; 6,189 in 1882; 5,678 in 1883; 3,351 in 1884, and 810 in 1885.

Fixing July 1, 1865, as the average date of discharge and $100 as the average yearly rate, it will appear that to pay the arrears in these case it will require approximately the following sums:

Year.	No. of pensioners filed.	Yearly value.	Amount.
1880	27,027	$1,500	$39,040,500
1881	4,812	1,600	7,699,200
1882	6,189	1,700	10,521,300
1883	5,678	1,800	10,220,400
1884	3,551	1,900	6,366,900
1885	810	2,000	1,620,000
Amount required to pay invalids now on rolls			75,468,300

The 29,558 allowances to widows and others include the pensions granted to minors, against whom no limitation has run, as well as to dependent relatives whose title did not accrue, in many instances, until the death of the soldier and of another person. In the case of a widow the title will accrue at the death of the soldier, so that it is difficult to fix a date from which to compute the amount which will probably be due. Assuming nine years as the average period, and $100 as the average yearly rate, the amount required to pay arrears in 10,000 (estimated) cases will be, approximately, $9,000,000. Adding to this amount the amount to pay invalids ($75,468,300), the amount required to pay pensioners now on rolls will be $84,468,300.

To state the amount which will probably be required to pay the arrears in cases still pending in this office will be a matter largely of conjecture. It may, however, be stated that on the 30th day of June, 1885, there were pending in this office 171,402 invalids' and 61,582 widows' and other applications.

Assuming that 60 per cent. of these will receive favorable consideration, and that eighteen years will be the average arrears period in invalid cases, and nine years in widows and other cases, the annual rate averaging $100 in each class, there will probably be required to pay the arrears to them the following amounts:

60 per cent. of 61,582 = 36,949 × $900	33,254,100
	218,367,900
Add the amount required to pay pensioners now on rolls	84,468,300
Total probable result of repeal of limitation	302,836,200

It is, of course, easy to conceive that the repeal of the limitation in the acts of 1879 will greatly stimulate the filing of new cases, and especially applications for invalid pension.

How largely it will result and what percentage of such cases will be allowed are so completely matters of conjecture that it is not thought profitable to consider them.

THIRD PROPOSITION.

The passage of the House bill 545 will increase the monthly rate of widows, minors, dependent mothers, and dependent fathers, which is now $8, to $12. It will also increase from $8 to $12 the monthly rate of widows of soldiers who served in the war of 1812. It does not disturb the rate of the 2,945 survivors of the war of 1812 now on the rolls, who receive $8 per month, or the rate of this class hereafter to be allowed out of the seventy applications unsettled July, 1885.

On the 30th day of June, 1885, there were on the pension-rolls 80,767 persons pensioned as widows, minors, and dependent relatives of soldiers who served in the war of 1861, and 17,212 persons as widows of soldiers of the war of 1812. Omitting from the former class those whose monthly rate is in excess of $12 and remembering that $8 is the uniform rate in the latter class, the increased cost to the Government, pursuant to the proposed legislation, will be approximately as follows, annually:

75,767 × $48	$3,636,816 00
17,212 × 48	826,176 00
Increase to pensioners now on rolls	4,462,992 00

On the 30th day of June, 1885, there were on file in this office 35,000 applications for widows' and other pensions which will probably be favorably considered, and in which the rate will be fixed at $8 per month. There were also 602 applications for pensions by widows of 1812 soldiers, of which number it is estimated that 500 will be favorably considered. To pay the increase of these classes as proposed by House bill No. 545 it will probably require, annually, the following amounts:

35,000 × $48	$1,680,000 00
	1,704,000 00
Add amount to pay pensioners now on roll	4,462,992 00
Total cost annually of increase	6,166,992 00

It may be proper to add that up to June 30, 1885, there had been rejected 48,780 claims to invalid pensions and 33,217 claims of widows and others, all of which were filed prior to July 1, 1880, and that up to the same date there had been rejected 85,589 invalid claims and 45,837 widows' and other claims, all of which were filed after July 1, 1880.

The question of how many of each of these classes will, upon reconsideration, be allowed, and what will be the consequent cost to the Government in connection with the first and second propositions, respectively, the Commissioner regards as opening a field so entirely speculative that he must decline to enter therein.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

JOHN C. BLACK,
Commissioner of Pensions.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Chairman Appropriations Committee,
House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pending bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SARAH L. BRAGG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1574) granting a pension to Sarah L. Bragg.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $30 per month, the name of Mrs. Sarah L. Bragg, late an army hospital matron, and the widow of George Bragg, formerly a private in Company A, One hundred and fifty-first Regiment of New York Volunteers.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out, in line 5, the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof "twelve."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANSON B. SAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1701) granting a pension to Anson B. Sams.

The bill was read, as follows:

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out "forty" and insert "thirty."

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call for the reading of the report in this case, and before doing so I desire to submit a few remarks with a view to attract the attention of members to it when it is read. While this bill comes from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, of which I am a member, I was not present at the time it was considered, or else I would have opposed it, although I dislike to oppose any pension case. This is not a bill for pensioning a widow of a soldier, but the daughter of a soldier, a gallant soldier to be sure. It is in favor of a lady who in her time enjoyed the protection and support of a husband, but who is now a widow. I do not understand it to be the policy of Congress to extend by legislation the benefits of the pension laws to daughters of generals who have had the good fortune to have enjoyed the protection and support of husbands.

Now, sir, I am not going to offer any strenuous objection to the passage of this bill. I have never made that a practice on the floor of the House. I simply desire to call the attention of the committee to the report, so that when it is read if other gentlemen do not object I certainly shall not object to the passage of the bill. But I doubt the propriety of this kind of legislation.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now let us have the report read.

Mr. STRUBLE. The report has not yet been read, and the statement I have made I have taken the time of the House to present for the purpose of specially asking the attention of the committee to the report while it is being read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. JONES, of Alabama) was read, as follows:

Frances McNeil Potter is a daughter of General John McNeil, United States Army; that John McNeil, of New Hampshire, was appointed a captain of infantry March 12, 1812, and had charge of the troops at Concord, and subsequently at Plattsburg, where he was charged also with the supervision of the drilling of the new soldiers. In August, 1813, he was promoted to the rank of major, and marched to Burlington in command of a regiment.

In July, 1814, he served in Brown's division, in Sackett's Harbor, until he was ordered with his regiment, in July, to the frontier at Niagara. During an attack by the enemy Colonel Campbell, of the Eleventh Regiment, fell, and the command of the regiment devolved upon Major McNeil.

The action of this officer at this battle, known in history as the battle of Chippewa, was supposed by his superior officers to have had a determining influence in securing the success of the American Army.

General Scott, in his report, said: "The self-possession of Major McNeil under fire was unequaled," and "the flank movement of the gallant McNeil in this important battle turned the fortunes of the day and gave victory to the American troops."

General Jesup declares:

"I followed the Eleventh Regiment with my command over the bridge. I had ample opportunity of witnessing the conduct of Major McNeil. He formed his regiment under fire of the enemy with the accuracy of a parade. He promptly availed himself of every advantage presented, and he wielded his force with great coolness and judgment, and on his own responsibility and without orders made the decisive movement at Chippewa."

General Scott, in his report to General Brown, said:

"Major McNeil deserves everything which conspicuous skill and gallantry can win from a grateful country."

He subsequently commanded the Eleventh Regiment at the battle of Lundy's Lane, and in this engagement he exhibited not only the military tact, judgment, and bravery that had been exhibited in the battle of Chippewa, but was severely wounded and rendered a cripple for life. He subsequently served in 1824 on the Indian frontier.

His death, which occurred in Washington, February, 1850, was commemorated appropriately by the action of both Houses of Congress, which were then in session, eulogies being delivered upon him by Mr. Herbert of the House, and Mr. Hale in the Senate.

This officer was for merit and gallantry in the service promoted from a captaincy to the rank of brevet brigadier-general, and not only devoted his time to the service of the country through a long series of years, but finally succumbed to the effect of wounds received and diseases contracted in the service. And your committee are of the opinion that the gallant service of the father to his country entitles his daughter to consideration from his grateful countrymen.

And your committee recommend that House bill 1625 do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out the word "forty," in the seventh line, and insert the word "thirty."

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I only rise for the purpose of asking the favor of the committee—inasmuch as Mr. JONES, who reported this bill and knows all of the facts in the case, is not present, that it be passed over informally until he can be here.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection this bill will be passed over informally, to retain its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ROBERT D. FORT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1319) to increase the pension of Robert D. Fort.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Robert D. Fort, formerly a member of Capt. Richard Benson's company of Tennessee militia, who was in the military service in the year 1814, to $50 per month, in lieu of the pension of $8 per month he is now receiving.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. WOLFORD) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1319) to increase the pension of Robert D. Fort, submit the following report:

They recommend that the words "fifty dollars" be stricken out and that "thirty dollars" be inserted in lieu thereof, and that the bill thus amended do pass.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I fear, sir, and that is the reason why I want to say a word, that through my carelessness and laziness justice has not been done to this old man. In the first place, I neglected to write a report in order to place it before the House until just about the time that the bill was to be reported, and then I got a gentleman to write it for me, and he put in that kind of a report which has just been read, without stating any of the facts in reference to the finding of the committee or the evidence on which it was based.

This old man was in the war of 1812, that is to say, he served in 1814. He has drawn a pension of $8 a month for many years. He was a hard-working man, and raised a large family of children, who are all now very poor. He is himself in his ninety-first year, and is almost blind. His wife, and he only had one, is old and blind, and they have no means of support.

Mr. STRUBLE. Are both blind?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir, practically; that is to say, the old man is almost blind, while his wife is entirely blind.

I did injustice again in another thing in not writing the report myself. I was appointed a subcommittee to investigate the matter, and ascertained these facts, and I suppose everybody knows my views on the subject of pensions [laughter]. I disagreed slightly with the cold, deliberate, sensible speech made here to-night, for I believe that all ought to be pensioned, and I believe that we can afford to and are able to pension them. But I do not want to enter upon a discussion of that question now.

I believed then, in the preparation of this report and in the consideration of this bill, that I would put it at a very moderate figure, and therefore the subcommittee reported to the full committee, which report was adopted, recommending $35 a month as the pension in this case. The mistake is my own in not having written the report myself setting forth the facts upon which it is founded. But the committee did unanimously recommend $35 a month to be inserted in the bill instead of fifty, and I believe if I had said fifty the committee would have reported with equal unanimity, for they did report in favor of the amount recommended very cordially. I think they all felt deeper for the old man than even I did, and I can hardly excuse myself for not presenting the matter to the House in the shape of a report; but the facts in the case can be stated by the gentleman from Mississippi, who is familiar with them.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, at the request of the gentleman from Kentucky I will state the circumstances, as far as they come within my knowledge, of this case. I have known this old gentleman all my life. I, of course, do not know his exact age, but I know what he has told me his age is, and I know him to be a truthful man, and his appearance indicates the fact that he is fully the age claimed. I have known him for forty or more years. He is living quite near me. He is now in his ninety-first year and is very feeble. Before the war he was a man of some little property, but the war deprived him of that, and he is now quite poor. His wife, the wife of his youth, is living and she is blind. The old gentleman could recognize me or could distinguish a white man from a colored man at four, five, or ten feet, perhaps, but that is all the sight he has. He is able to go about in a feeble way but is unable to make a living; and his wife, who is over eighty years of age, is entirely blind. They have lived together as man and wife for some sixty-five years.

Mr. LONG. Are there any children?

Mr. MORGAN. There are four children, two sons and two daughters. They are all poor and humble people. The two sons are engaged in farming and make a living by following the plow. Each of the sons has a large family, and the two daughters are married and also have families. They are all poor, and it will be a great boon to the old man to grant this pension. In draughting the bill I put in the sum of $50, leaving it entirely to the judgment of the committee to do what is just as between that man and the Government.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] has stated to me it was the intention and order of the committee that the amount of the pension should be $35. I will state to the House that that extra $5 would be a great comfort to this old man and this old lady. I suppose, if he should die first, his widow would be entitled to go on the roll. And, if Congress would raise the amount to $40, they could hire a servant to do their cooking and washing and build fires, &c., and with the remainder live comfortably.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question. With his knowledge of this old pair what does he think is the present expectation of life of the old man?

Mr. MORGAN. I think he can not live but a short time.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Not I suppose to exceed the age of one hundred years?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know how long he may live. [Laughter.] A man who has lived ninety years might possibly live a good while longer; that is a matter of speculation.

Mr. LONG. Let us trust that this increase of pension may extend his life.

Mr. MORGAN. This will make his remaining years more comfortable. I ask to substitute $40 for the amount in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment of the committee to strike out $30 and insert $40.

The amendment was adopted.

The amendment as amended was adopted; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

[SEAL.] E. B. ALLEN, Secretary of State.

I do not know where petitions of this class have usually gone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The custom has been to refer such petitions to the Committee on Education and Labor; and this petition will be so referred if there be no objection.

Mr. FRYE. I have what is intended to be a petition, addressed to me from the Knights of Labor of Portland, Me., earnestly requesting the organization of a Territorial form of Government in the Indian Territory, the opening of lands in that Territory to immediate settlement under the homestead laws, &c. I ask that the paper be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I ask that the paper be received and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. I also present from the same body a petition in favor of the repeal of the silver-dollar coinage act, and also in favor of continued efforts to secure a system of bimetallism with foreign nations to make gold and silver standard currency. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I present the petition of John Crean, of Washington, D. C., who represents that he was injured while in the employ of the United States Government, and prays compensation for the injury. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of Jethro Snow, of Hubbardstown, Mass., who desires that, under the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, all intoxicating liquors in the United States may be destroyed by law. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Education and Labor, and commend it specially to the attention of my friend the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

The motion was agreed to.

I ask that this, which is a very brief paper, be read, so that it may go into the RECORD for reference, as the report of the committee has already been submitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be read.

Mr. INGALLS. If the paper is respectful in form let it be printed without reading. The Senator has examined it.

Mr. CULLOM. It is too brief to be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that.

The memorial was referred to the Select Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WESTERN FURNITURE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
Saint Louis, Mo., January 21, 1886.

SIR: Referring to the inclosed petition of the Western Furniture Manufacturers' Association, I desire to ask attention to the fact that while, according to the last United States census, the manufacturing industries of this country are classed under three hundred and thirty-two different titles, that of furniture manufacturing stands fifteenth in the list, and is therefore classed as one of the great "productive industries," there being in 1880 about 5,600 establishments, giving employment to about 62,000 people and producing annually goods valued at about $83,000,000.

The membership of this association is drawn from manufacturers west of the Alleghany Mountains, but I have every reason to believe that the manufacturers of the New England States entertain the same opinion on this subject as we do.

Respectfully, yours,

J. W. TREMAYNE, Secretary.

To the CHAIRMAN
Of the Senate Select Committee on Interstate Railroad Transportation, Washington, D. C.

THE WESTERN FURNITURE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
Saint Louis, Mo., July 22, 1885.

To the honorable the Senatorial Interstate Traffic Committee:

We, the Western Furniture Manufacturers' Association in annual convention assembled, in the city of Chicago, would respectfully submit the following, and recommend that Congress enforce it by proper legislation:

First. That Congress compel the railroads in the United States to adopt a uniform classification for freight, which shall not be changed except by authority of the Government, and then only after giving at least three months' notice to the public.

Second. That all rebates be prohibited under a severe penalty.

Third. That railroads be prohibited from discriminating against any section of the country by charging more for carrying freight in any direction than they would for carrying same in any opposite direction.

Fourth. That a commission be appointed by Congress having authority to adjust rates and settle all differences between railroads and shippers.

Respectfully, yours,

CHARLES P. SLIGH,
President.
J. W. TREMAYNE,
Secretary.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present a petition of the State Bar Association of Nebraska, praying that that State may be divided into two judicial districts. The petition sets forth, not at very great length but quite forcibly, the great necessity which exists for a division of that State. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to be considered in connection with the bill heretofore introduced for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of the Kansas City Clearing House Association, praying that immediate action be taken to extend the civil law over the Indian Territory, by giving jurisdiction to the United States courts in civil cases in like manner as jurisdiction has been conferred upon them in criminal cases.

This is becoming a matter of very great interest. It is charged that a large number of people who are indebted have taken their property across the line into the Indian Territory so as to avoid the process of law, and the Territory is becoming a place of refuge for men who are attempting to avoid the payment of their debts. I hope that the committee will take prompt action on this petition. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, if that is the proper committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. The committee are now considering the very subject to which the Senator alludes.

Mr. HARRISON. A bill establishing a court in the Indian Territory and defining its jurisdiction was sent to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition has been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon, and they were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 65) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, the laws authorizing the sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 1114) defining the powers of the Commissioners of the General Land Office in respect to canceling private entries of the public domain and to quiet title to lands in the Northwest; and

A bill (S. 1221) relating to suits by the United States to set aside land patents.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of the same committee I report a bill, accompanied by a written report, which embodies the main provisions of the three bills just reported by me adversely.

The bill (S. 1296) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber-culture, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1223) for the relief of Wilbur F. Steele, reported it with an amendment.

ARKANSAS HOT SPRINGS.

Mr. BERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back the concurrent resolution relative to the bath-house and hot-water privileges upon the reservation of Government lands at Hot Springs, Ark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will take its place on the Calendar.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent to dispose of the resolution at this time, as it will occupy but a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to see it in print. I ask that it may lie over under the rule.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to hear it read as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is reported with an amendment, and will be read as proposed to be amended if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the leases heretofore made of the bath-house and hot-water privileges upon the reservation of Government lands at Hot Springs, Ark., have expired by limitation of law; and

Whereas the Attorney-General of the United States has given an opinion that such leases may be renewed by the Secretary of the Interior without additional legislation:

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the opinion of Congress such leases of bath-house and hot-water privileges should not be renewed by the Secretary of the Interior unless the Forty-ninth Congress shall adjourn without having legislated with reference thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, being objected to, goes over under the rule.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to give notice to the Senator from Arkansas that when the resolution is before the Senate for action I shall move to amend so as to confine it to the present session of Congress instead of to the Forty-ninth Congress, in accordance with the view I suggested the other day. I think that will afford plenty of time for legislation on the subject. I merely give the notice so that the Senator may think over it.

Mr. BERRY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will take its place on the Calendar.

COMPILATION OF SENATE ELECTION CASES.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back a concurrent resolution to print additional copies of the Compilation of Senate Election Cases adversely to the resolution and proposing the adoption of a substitute. I ask that the substitute be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska reports adversely a resolution which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound for the use of the two Houses 2,500 additional copies of the Compilation of Senate Election Cases, 1789-1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution reported by the committee as a substitute will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound 3,050 additional copies of the Compilation of Senate Election Cases, 1789-1885; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 50 copies for the compiler of the work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is upon the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution reported adversely will be postponed indefinitely if there be no objection.

REPORT ON CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report adversely the motion to print the message of the President of the United States transmitting a letter of the Secretary of State with the final report of the commission appointed to visit the states of Central and South America. The committee, ascertaining that that document has been ordered printed by the House of Representatives, report back the motion, recommending no action.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska what order has been made touching the printing?

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand that the usual number of the report has been ordered printed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. FRYE. That is how many?

Mr. MANDERSON. Nineteen hundred. The committee have thought it best after the 1,900 were printed that the House of Representatives should take action in reference to the printing of any additional number that might be required.

Mr. FRYE. To our merchants and manufacturers it is the most important document that there is.

Mr. MANDERSON. So I understand; and the printing will be hastened I think by the course the committee suggest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Committee on Printing will be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

PRINTING OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a House concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of the President's last annual message, with the accompanying documents, to report it favorably with certain amendments suggested by the committee. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound 25,000 extra copies of the President's last annual message and accompanying documents for the use of the House.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were, in line 2, to strike out the words "and bound," and in line 4, to strike out the words "and accompanying documents;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 25,000 extra copies of the President's last annual message for the use of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. INGALLS. Why are the accompanying documents omitted? I think it is customary to print them.

Mr. MANDERSON. They are printed under the general law, and that fact seemed to be misapprehended.

Mr. INGALLS. The other House did not know what they were doing, then?

Mr. MANDERSON. I am not quite at liberty to say that.

The amendments were agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was concurred in.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1319) to confirm entries of lands heretofore made under the land laws of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I desire that the object of this bill, and the motive in offering it, shall not be misunderstood. It is, simply, that the innocent person seeking land under the laws shall have the benefit of such laws as they were administered when his entry was made. It does not defend rulings of former administrations, nor question the correctness of rules and regulations now established. As the citizen can only obey the law by the direction of those who for the time administer it, injustice would be done to make him a sufferer by change of policies.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1320) for the erection of a public building at the city of Beatrice, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs are hereby instructed to report a bill modifying the civil-service law, so that Union soldiers and sailors who served with distinction in the late war shall not be required to submit to a civil-service examination before appointment to any of the offices embraced in that law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CALL. Merely for the purpose of saying a word, and then I shall ask that it be printed and laid on the table.

I merely wish to say that the resolution has been prepared by me in consequence of a letter received from a very distinguished officer, as I am informed, of the Union Army, resident in the State of Florida, who served with great distinction in the war, was severely wounded, and is now in receipt of a pension from the Government. The letter to which I refer is as follows:

NORWALK, PUTNAM COUNTY, FLORIDA, January 24, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your inclosure of General Black's letter, dated January 4, 1886. In compliance with the suggestions therein made I wrote the secretary Civil Service Commission, who furnished me the necessary blanks and instructions. I have studied them carefully, also the civil-service report for 1885, and am forced to the conclusion that it is a "freeze-out." If I were financially in a condition to expend $100, which I am not, for the purpose of going to Washington for examination, my chances even then for appointment would be very remote.

Thanking you sincerely for the interest you have manifested in my behalf, I think it best for me to drop the matter here.

I am, sir, very respectfully, yours,

ROBT. M. BARD.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

As the letter states, this gentleman recently made application for an appointment as one of the examiners in the Pension Bureau. He is a man of great intelligence, and one who has served the country in a position of distinction. His letter discloses the fact that after an examination of the regulations in regard to civil-service examinations required to be made before an appointment he is unable to comply with them.

It occurs to me that some remedy ought to be provided where a man has sufficient ability and sufficient intelligence to have served with distinction in the Army and is not able to comply with the regulations of the Civil Service Commission before obtaining an inferior appointment as an examiner. So I have introduced the resolution, and I move that it be printed and laid on the table, with the accompanying letter.

The motion was agreed to.

CALLED BONDS HELD BY NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

ALFRED B. MEACHAM.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate whether Alfred B. Meacham, late superintendent of Indian affairs for the State of Oregon, was at any time, and, if so, on what date, declared by the Treasury Department, or its accounting officers, or any of them, to be in default on his official bond as such superintendent of Indian affairs and in arrears to the United States on such bond, and, if so, to what amount and under what particular bond, and on what account or accounts; also, if he was so declared to be in default and in arrears, what amounts of money, if any, have been paid to said Alfred B. Meacham since the date when he was so declared to be in default and in arrears by the United States as compensation or salary, and for what service or services the same was paid, and the date of payment of each item thereof; and also what further or additional amounts, if any, have been paid said Alfred B. Meacham by the United States since the date when he was so declared to be in default and arrears on his said official bond, the dates of such payments respectively, the several amounts thereof, and on what account or accounts paid.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate, That the President of the United States be requested to bring to the attention of the Imperial Government of Russia the claim of the legal representatives of Benjamin W. Perkins, deceased, a citizen of the United States, against the Government of Russia, growing out of a contract or contracts, alleged by the claimant to be obligatory on that government, for the purchase and delivery to that government of powder and arms during the Crimean war, in the years 1855 and 1856, with a view to ask the said government to consider the said claim and to provide for the allowance and payment of such sum as shall be found to be justly due to the said claimant.

The precedent for this resolution is the one adopted by the Senate at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, in the year 1884, on the claim of Helen M. Fiedler, executrix, against the Government of Brazil.

Mr. HOAR. The resolution is offered by request of the representatives of the person interested in the claim. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

STATUES OF COLUMBUS, LAFAYETTE, AND GARFIELD.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the concurrent resolution reported by me from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on the 28th of January be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the concurrent resolution will be read.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to offer a substitute making the concurrent resolution a joint resolution and proposing a further amendment at the end of the resolution. I ask unanimous consent that the substitute be now considered as the original proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will be read by its title.

The joint resolution (S. R. 35) setting apart public reservations for statues to Columbus, Lafayette, and James A. Garfield was read the first time by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks the consent of the Senate to substitute this in place of the concurrent resolution, its form being changed to a joint resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read at length for information.

The joint resolution was read at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, &c., That the circle at the western entrance of the Capitol grounds from Pennsylvania avenue shall be, and hereby is, forever set apart as a site for a statue of Christopher Columbus; and the circle at the western entrance to the Capitol grounds from Maryland avenue shall also be, and hereby is, forever set apart as a site for a statue of the Marquis de Lafayette; and the naval monument, now standing upon the circle first herein mentioned, shall be removed and placed upon the triangular reservation bounded by Connecticut avenue, Twentieth street, and Q street. Also, that in lieu of the site selected for a statue of the late James A. Garfield under the authority of an act approved July 7, 1884, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes," by the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library, and the chairman of the Garfield monumental committee of the Society of the Army of the Cumberland, a new and different site shall be selected, and the Secretary of War, the President pro tempore of the Senate, and the chairman of the Garfield monumental committee of the Society of the Army of the Cumberland are hereby authorized to make such selection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Vermont that it would probably be better to journalize the proceedings by postponing indefinitely the concurrent resolution and taking up for consideration the joint resolution now reported.

Mr. MORRILL. I will make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, this joint resolution has the unanimous support of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. No appropriation is now called for, but a moderate sum will of course at some future and proper time be asked for.

All are aware that near the western entrance to the Capitol grounds there are two circular plots of ground, one at the intersection of Pennsylvania avenue and First street, and another at the intersection of Maryland avenue and First street. Both of these circles were originally intended as twin sites for statues or monuments. That points of such equal prominence should be decorated in some equal and adequate manner is most obvious. To preserve and carry out this intention, it has appeared to the committee that statues of men whose names have been indissolubly linked to the early history of our country, and possessing something of a world-wide fame, might most appropriately occupy these conspicuous places on the western entrance to the grounds in front of the American Capitol.

After careful consideration, and with the advice of many of our fellow-members of the Senate, the names we have selected for the statues as most appropriate are those presented, of Columbus and Lafayette.

Columbus has had his memory perpetuated by the bestowal of his name upon our towns and rivers, and also more prominently by the name of the District of Columbia given here to the seat of Government. The picture of the landing of Columbus, by Vanderlyn, in the Rotunda of the Capitol, and the marble group by Persico on the steps of the eastern front of the Capitol, where the Indian girl appears to be a conspicuous figure, are the only objects for which Congress has ever been called upon to make any expenditure in honor of the great discoverer of America. For him no monument, so far as I am aware, has been erected on the American continent. After his death in Spain, where he died in the most pitiable poverty, a magnificent monument was erected to "soothe the dull, cold ear of death" by King Ferdinand in a vain endeavor to blot out the remembrance of his own base and kingly ingratitude. A singularly sad fate seems to have pursued the track of the bold navigator—being robbed of his rights while living, and when dead robbed of honor fairly won, as the new hemisphere, brought to light by Columbus, wears the ineffaceable stamp of another name.

Indebted, as we must feel ourselves to be, to Columbus more especially than all the rest of mankind for this fair portion and latest-born half of the word, it would seem not to be an excess of our duty, but a privilege to be legally claimed, to place here in the heart of the American Republic some monument that will testify to all coming ages that Columbus did not lack respectful appreciation in the New World which he opened to our fathers, so fruitful to them and to us of countless advantages.

There is, however, an impediment in the way of the accomplishment of this purpose, but which it is proposed to remove, and with the approval of parties most deeply interested. On the circle at the intersection of First street and Pennsylvania avenue now stands the Naval Monument, which was assigned to this cite when its full effect could only be inadequately comprehended from an exhibition of a miniature copy in plaster. The monument, with its fine figures, is exceedingly creditable to the sculptor as a work of art, but it is mournful and rather funereal in character, and most certainly is misplaced and inappropriate at the front of the Capitol Grounds. If it were to remain there then a monument of similar sadness would be required to represent the Army on the other circle, at the intersection of First street and Maryland avenue.

The attention of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has been directed by Admiral Porter, whose good judgment few will venture to dispute, to a new sight for the Naval Monument "on Connecticut avenue north of Dupont Circle," which, the Admiral says, "will accommodate the monument beautifully, and is the best and only place in the city for it," and the committee are disposed to cordially indorse this selection.

On the other circle, at the intersection of Maryland avenue and First street, it is proposed to place the statute of Lafayette. Many counties and towns in different States bear his name, and Congress appropriated many years since for his benefit a township of land and $200,000. His portrait has also been procured for the interior of the House of Representatives, but the only statute, as I believe, erected to his memory in our country is that recently given by a patriotic gentleman to the city of Burlington, in Vermont.

The affection of our people for Lafayette while living, and their abiding respect for his important services in our Revolutionary war, is undoubted, and no other name of equal historic prominence has been suggested as more worthy of the distinction now proposed. Beyond this, such action on our part would be construed as a graceful tribute to the French Republic.

Here again we find an impediment in the way. In the sundry civil bill of 1884 there was inserted a paragraph as follows:

For the preparation of a site and the erection of a pedestal for a statue of the late President James A. Garfield, $30,000; said site to be selected by and said pedestal to be erected under the supervision of the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library, and the chairman of the Garfield monumental committee of the Society of the Army of the Cumberland.

Under the authority here given it rather unexpectedly appears that the circle at the intersection of Maryland avenue and First street has been selected for the statue of the late President Garfield. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, however, believing that this selection was inadvertently made, and made perhaps because the site at the time happened to be unoccupied, propose to authorize and direct the same committee to make a new and different selection of a site, as there are many places which would be not less desirable and some far more appropriate. President Garfield was greatly beloved and tenderly lamented by the whole country, and he was cruelly assassinated, but so was President Lincoln; and if the statue of the former were to occupy one of these circles, then to preserve the symmetry of the original plan a statue of the latter should occupy the other circle. It will be remembered, however, that a statue of President Lincoln has already been provided on Lincoln Square. But there is room on other public reservations quite as attractive and wholly unoccupied.

In as brief terms as I have been able to use I have explained the purpose of the joint resolution, and I hope it may be considered of sufficient importance to receive at once the favorable action of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan will allow the Chair. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this joint resolution now. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONGER. It was on that point I was rising.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposed the Senator wished to address the Chair.

Mr. INGALLS. How is it open to objection this morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was introduced this morning as a new proposition.

Mr. INGALLS. As an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I asked unanimous consent to make the substitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator as moving to indefinitely postpone the former resolution with a view to take this up as an independent proposition.

Mr. MORRILL. As a mere matter of form I did that at the suggestion of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal Clerk informs the Chair that in the arrangement of the Journal it will be most proper and orderly to take the other way.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not desire to press this if a single Senator has any objection to its consideration.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make one or two remarks if it is to be acted on at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. We are all aware that the different monuments which have been placed in different parts of this city have been placed by order of Congress, I suppose, one in one square and another in another square, in former times, and almost every session there is a proposition to remove from the place appropriated to it some one or another of these monuments. I have no particular objection to making changes wherever they may be desirable or wherever there is a fitness or propriety in making changes; but I submit that the proposed change, in order to secure for Columbus a little contracted circle at the foot of the hill at the head of Pennsylvania avenue by removing a monument which has no particular significance, represents no particular thing, which may or may not be as a work of art pleasant to look upon to those who frequent Pennsylvania avenue, is not a desirable change and not a fit place to select for a statue of Columbus. It is down in a hollow. It is surrounded, I admit, by a beautiful tracery and net-work of street-railway tracks. It is unapproachable with safety for women and children, and even for men on foot, at any hour of the day.

The other circle at the head of Maryland avenue is still more inappropriate as a place for a monument for any man that the people of the United States would delight to honor. That, too, is surrounded by a net-work of railway tracks, not only encircling half or more of this circle, but, with other tracks, leading direct to the site of the proposed statue. The Maryland avenue circle is out of the way, not very easy of access either for pedestrians or for carriages containing visiting people of the United States. It seems to me it is as inappropriate a place for either of these two statues as the selection of the place for the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall was down under the hill and behind the trees. I have wondered that the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall was not placed in the open area of the grotto, more frequented, more observable down under that tile-roof than in the place where it stands now.

If it is worth while to have erected a suitable statue to the memory of Columbus, the discoverer of this new world, and to that distinguished foreigner who came here in the flush and glow of youth to tender his services to our people struggling for freedom, and who became the champion of American liberty on this continent by the side of Washington and the great heroes of our own country, place it in a fitting situation, lift it up out of the valley of humiliation, and away from the rattle and the strain of cars, away from the net-work of street-car rails and tracks; place it in some position of dignity, and one where it may be looked up to with pleasure and not down upon with scorn.

Sir, I venture to say that the good people of the United States who are compelled to look down upon the statue of Columbus, and look down upon the statue of Lafayette, if placed at the sites proposed by this committee, would become humpbacked in looking down upon the discoverer of the continent and the friend of the early days of the liberty of this nation.

The great fault in placing monuments in this city of Washington is that inappropriate places have been selected for those monuments. The great Washington Monument was placed upon the lowest ground in this city that could be said to be above the overflow of the freshets of the Potomac, away down almost on tide-level, a monument only peculiar, and only wonderful and only magnificent on account of its height and of the massiveness of the structure—a monument which should have been placed upon the highest ground within the District of Columbia; a monument which should have been lifted out of the swamp so as to gain three or four hundred feet in elevation upon some of the high hills of the Soldiers' Home, or at least upon the highest ground on Capitol Hill to begin with, and then add 576 feet to the elevation thus acquired. The common judgment of the people of the United States who visit this city is aroused to inquire why Congress when it undertook to rebuild that old decaying monument, commenced forty years ago, did not remove it to some elevated place, inasmuch as height and show are all that was to be obtained by a great monument of stone reared toward the heavens.

Now, sir, I may be alone in my view upon the subject of placing the monument of Columbus down at the foot of the hill; I may be alone in my view of the impropriety of placing the monument of Lafayette in another direction at the foot of the hill and make its foundations among the old shifting sands of Goose Creek as it was called, and of the Tiber when it was renamed, as the dirty creek that runs through the capital of the United States, for both are on the level of the shifting sands formed by the currents of that insalubrious stream. What particular motive led to the selection of these places for these two monuments I certainly, in the limited moment in which I have had to consider it while the Senator from Vermont was making his remarks upon it, have been unable to discover.

Sir, it is said that there is no monument of Lafayette; no monument of Columbus. We have a striking monument of Columbus in front of the Capitol. No one views it, not even the rude frontiersman from the West, but wonders what there is in that monument of Columbus with his ball or his apple, the representative of the base-ball clubs of the United States. What is there in that monument to indicate the great discoverer of the New World? Newspaper critics and people who come here to see, and the boys who play ball in front of the Capitol, declare that Columbus and Washington—Greenough's Washington in front of him—are playing a game of pitch and toss and catch, Columbus with ball in hand, and there is some little propriety in the suggestion which comes naturally to the mind of the inartistic, uneducated, unrefined citizen of the country that Washington is there with uplifted hand ready to receive the ball, Columbus (looking as little like Columbus as he does like Sancho Panza) preparing to throw the ball, and the wonderful woman crouched at his side, no one can tell whether she may not be the wife of the catcher or the pitcher, entreating Columbus to withdraw from the game before he has a dislocated thumb or a bruised arm. [Laughter.]

There is one memorial to Lafayette in the Capitol of the nation. There is in the Hall of the House of Representatives a painting procured many, many years ago by a citizen of Michigan from France, of which this is a duplicate, and another presented by that citizen to the State of Michigan, now in the hall of the house of representatives of my State, a counterpart, the duplicate of the one in this building; a picture said to be valuable, a painting said to be life-like, a painting said to be a representative of that great friend of America. Although this nation has never done anything in that regard, I feel proud that a citizen of my own State thirty years ago and more, perhaps, did from his own treasure and with his own funds and by his own zeal procure the only two good pictures of Lafayette that have been received in the United States, and that have ever been considered as a fit memorial of that grand and glorious name so intimately associated with our early history and so dear to the hearts of American citizens throughout the land.

Sir, my early life passed on the frontiers did not permit me the opportunity to have my tastes educated and refined. There never has been the classical eye; there never has been the æsthetic taste circulating around in my veins; never been educated in the subtleties of the "renaissance." I do not know what it means. [Laughter.] There is not a Senator here knows what it means; but I have counted within my recollection thirteen Senators, seven on that side of the house, six on this, who have used that expression "renaissance" within two years from last Thursday prior to this time. With a kind of solicitude and humility, which becomes my ignorance on such occasions, I have been reminded to ask what they meant by that expression, and I met with the same reply that I expected, that instead of acknowledging their ignorance, as I am willing to do mine, they said they supposed almost everybody knew what that meant. [Laughter.] My learning was at fault; my advances have been repelled and rebuffed by the very men whose expressions, whose use of the words had incited me to more study to inform myself of the unknown things of art.

Sir, I have seen it stated for many years, from time to time, in the art reviews of critics who have studied the statuary and the monuments of this magnificent city, this city of magnificent distances, that there is not in the whole city one single work of art patronized and executed by the will of the people of this nation that is worthy of its place. The attention of the common citizen who comes here with his wife and daughter, and wanders through the ornamental rooms of this Capitol, may be drawn away by the kind wife as he is looking at the nude figures on the walls for fear his taste might become a little irregular. Take the picture in the rotunda of the Capitol, Washington—it is said to be Washington in the guide-book, I believe—seated up among the clouds, and damp clouds at that, with the angels crowding around him, as if a thunder-storm had poured out all the beauties of heaven in his presence; and Neptune with his trident, gods and goddesses and angels, and demons for aught I know, surrounding that great canopy above us representing the glory of Washington. I do not know but that is all according to the innate proprieties of art. It may be a beautiful painting, but I must say that the only thing about it that ever approved itself to my mind was that it was so far up that "distance lent enchantment to the view." That is about all there is about it. I say it with sincerity. I am no fit person to make a criticism, and have ventured to make these remarks that this resolution may go over, and others who do know or pretend to know something of art may think of this subject a little before it shall be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. I have been delighted, as I always am, with the speech on art by the Senator from Michigan. I discover that his chief objection to the present joint resolution appears to be that these sites are each surrounded by railroads. I suppose the Senator may have heard of the speech of Mr. Wise—I believe Henry A. Wise, of Virginia—in relation to the statue of Columbus on the steps of the Capitol, and the statue in front of Washington. I believe it was said by Wise that Washington exclaimed to Christopher Columbus, who was apparently holding a ten-pin ball aloft in his hands, "Christopher, why don't you let her rip?" [Laughter.] Now the Senator from Michigan, as it appears to me, has "let her rip" this morning; and if I should find that there are not two-thirds of the Senate in favor of this resolution I shall not desire to have it passed.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, the Senator from the foot-hills of the Green Mountains, with the vision of Liberty upon the mountains and all kinds of strange forms passing in the clouds, has a poetical temperament and a poetical vision and great taste in these matters of art; but I must say that in the serio-comic allusions I made to some things about this city—and some of my suggestions were very important, and I saw they were received favorably by my friends around the Senate Chamber—of all the things I suggested relating to art and the lack of art, art culture, and places for exhibition, the Senator can think of nothing (and I do not know whether to accept it as a matter of pride or a matter of regret that in all the visions I presented to his mind he can think of nothing) but the Senator from Michigan's reply to him and tell a story about Columbus that some wise man told. [Laughter.]

I do not pretend to understand these questions of art, but I have heard learned disquisitions from the Senator from Vermont upon art works here until I have thought that if the country had not needed his great services and the powers of his mind in legislation and carrying forward many of the measures affecting the vast concerns of a great and proud nation, he mistook his calling, and ought to have been a painter, or a sculptor, or an artist; and yet he turns as if he had no reply to make to these questions, which are serious ones, about the appropriateness of this recommendation of his committee, and when I have suggested that the places are inappropriate he turns about with a story! I venture to say to the Senator that when this resolution comes up for discussion, and other gentlemen, better fitted than I am to discuss it, shall state more fully and forcibly than myself the value of these little suggestions, he will not turn them off with a joke or with ridicule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be considered read the second time and placed on the Calendar.

SIOUX RESERVATION IN DAKOTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the consideration of the Calendar is now in order under the eighth rule.

The bill (S. 52) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians, in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, was announced as first in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. After consultation with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], I offer what I now send to the desk as a substitute for the amendment which was pending at the time the Senate last had this bill under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment. The modified amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, section 17, after the word "education," it is proposed to insert:

Subject to such modifications as Congress shall deem most effective to secure to said Indians equivalent benefits of such education.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move, in order to cover the objections made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], an amendment which is satisfactory to him and to the Senator from Massachusetts having charge of the bill, to come in after the proviso in section 20. I think the first proviso is the one adopted on my motion, providing for the price of land sold for town sites, and I ask that this may follow that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment adopted ending with the word "void," in line 16, section 20, it is proposed to add:

And provided further, That no actual settler on said land shall be prevented from acquiring title to one quarter-section of the same by reason of the fact that he may heretofore have had the benefit of the pre-emption laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHURCH AND STATE.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolutions submitted by Mr. MORGAN January 11, 1886, in relation to the appointment of officers of the United States to participate with the officers of any church in the joint conduct and administration of the spiritual or temporal affairs of such church, &c.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the resolutions be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the union of church and state in the conduct of a joint administration of the temporal or spiritual affairs of any church or religious sect or society is dangerous to the freedom of religous worship and opinion, and violates the principles of the Constitution of the United States:

Resolved, 1. That in the opinion of the Senate it is not within the power of Congress to appoint officers of the United States, by whatever name they may be called, who shall, in the name of, or on behalf of, the United States, be required to participate with the officers of any church or religious sect or society, whether or not the same is incorporated, in the joint conduct and administration of the spiritual or temporal affairs of such church, sect, or society.

2. That it is a practical violation of the Constitution for the President of the United States to appoint any such officer under any law which assumes to confer such power on him, and that requires such duties to be performed by such appointee as are mentioned in the first resolution, and that fixes upon them a direct accountability or responsibility to the executive or legislative department of the Government of the United States for their conduct in office.

3. That it is not the constitutional function of the executive or legislative department of the Government of the United States to exert control in the direction and administration of the religious or temporal affairs of any church or religious sect or society; but such power, if it may be in any case lawfully exerted by any department of the Government of the United States, can only be exercised by the judicial department.

4. That the power of Congress to grant charters of incorporation to religious societies in localities under its exclusive jurisdiction does not extend to and include the right or authority to participate in the administration of the affairs of such incorporations through the agency of officers of the United States appointed for such purpose and accountable to the Government for their conduct in office.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the propositions stated in these resolutions I have always considered as axiomatic if not self-evident, and I would certainly not have brought them to the attention of the Senate but for the fact that certain recent action of the Senate itself seems to me to make it necessary that we should now have some definition, perhaps for the first time in the history of the Government, of what is the extent of the power of the Congress of the United States to interfere in the temporal administration of the churches of this country.

The separation of church and state in this country grew out of a sentiment which was promoted more earnestly and zealously by Roger Williams than by any other American citizen of whom I have any information. He started the great controversy in the time of the inauguration of the colonial system in this country which should separate the power of the Government from the spiritual or temporal power of the church, and which should draw the line of demarkation between those powers which in England had been combined, not merely as an act of law, but in the establishment or ordination of one of the estates of the realm. The Church of England, from which country we obtained our liberties and the first germs of our civilization, and our first ideas of personal protection and liberty, is not an incorporation. It may not be called a creature of the law any more than Parliament can be called a creature of the law or the royal prerogative a creature of the law. The Church of England is one of the estates of the realm. In the establishment of our constitutional system of government and even of our colonial system of government it was determined by almost the unanimous consent of the American people that that feature of the British Government should find no place either in the colonial system or in the States united under the more perpetual union that we now enjoy.

Recently an act was passed by this body, which requires that the President shall appoint and the Senate shall confirm fourteen trustees to act in a church. It makes no difference whether the action of these trustees is to be spiritual or temporal, whether the board of trustees is to be controlled by the spiritual authorities of the church, or whether they hold some right merely in trust of a temporal character, some property right for the benefit of the congregation; still there is distinctly the union in that act of church and state when we require that persons who hold the positions of officers of the United States Government shall, in that character, also hold the offices of a church, or an institution that calls itself a church. I regard that as an invasion of the fundamental law of the Constitution of the United States, affecting the executive power, the legislative power, and also the judicial power. Neither one has had to meet heretofore such a baneful attack. Neither one, after this law shall have gone into existence, can ever welcome again to itself the thought that it is free from association with spiritual affairs and church government.

In the District of Columbia there are many churches incorporated, none of them, I believe, by a special act of Congress, but under a general law of incorporation these religious establishments and charitable institutions have become incorporated with boards of managers, with trustees, and also with certain rights of spiritual and temporal control in the regulation of their own church affairs. So churches have been incorporated in the Territories, some by special act and some under general law. The question arises, has Congress the power to enact a law whereby the President shall be authorized and required to present to the Senate for confirmation the trustees in a church in the District of Columbia?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to inform the Senator that under the five-minute rule his time is up.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to make a few additional observations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that will be considered as the consent of the Senate. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no reason, if Congress can intervene in the churches in the District of Columbia to appoint trustees for the management of their temporal affairs, why they may not extend their jurisdiction and also control their spiritual affairs. The question is not how far Congress may go in its legislation, but whether it can take the first step.

As I understand the Constitution of the United States there is a positive inhibition upon us against legislating in regard to the establishment of religion; not to legislate either to establish it, to prevent its establishment, or to break down its establishment. The question is whether the subject is one within the domain of the legislative power of the Congress of the United States. The only safe rule that can be adopted is to adhere to the plain mandate of the Constitution that this subject is not within the domain of the Congressional power of legislation, that it is a subject under our Constitution which is left entirely to the free consciences of the people, who may assemble themselves in congregations under whatever organization they may choose to have, or whatever the organization we may choose to give them, without our interfering or interposing the power of the Government of the United States to participate in any way in the regulation or control of those assemblages or congregations.

Sir, we have passed an act here and sent it to the other House which requires that the President of the United States shall appoint fourteen officers of the United States as trustees in the Mormon Church at Salt Lake, in Utah. Let it be remembered that there are Mormon churches elsewhere than in Utah. In looking over a publication made by Mr. Childs, of the Philadelphia Ledger, the other day, I examined the list of churches in the city of Philadelphia, that city of brotherly love and of high morality, which we are all proud of. I find that among the congregations that exist in that city are two Mormon churches, one polygamist and the other anti-polygamist.

I doubt very much whether the State of Pennsylvania, which has broader powers in this regard than the Congress of the United States—because I do not understand that Pennsylvania is under a positive inhibition to legislate on such topics at all—I doubt very much whether the State of Pennsylvania could inject into that polygamist church in Philadelphia a body of trustees and, in the name of the State of Pennsylvania, regulate and control its affairs even to expurgate the polygamous feature from its creed. But there it stands in the light of day, there it stands by the tolerance, shall I say, of the people of Pennsylvania? It may be a tolerance that involves the deepest contempt of those people for it, yet it is such a tolerance as prevents that State from an actual interference in the affairs of that church.

Religion has been made free from the law in this country. Divorce of the church and the state was decreed when our Constitution was formed; but the Congress of the United States, it seems, wants to celebrate the nuptials of the new union between the Mormon Church and the United States Government, and take charge of the ordinances of that polygamous establishment in Utah. We have not sought to inject our powers into the Presbyterian or Methodist or Episcopalian or Baptist or the Catholic Church in this country. We seek for the first display of this character of power of a mingled authority of church and state, this new idea of the union of law and religion, in enacting that the bonds of union shall be celebrated at the polygamous altar of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the city of Salt Lake, the capital of Utah.

I maintain that the President of the United States would consult his duty in refusing to appoint this board of trustees which the Senate has voted shall be appointed by him and sent to the Senate for confirmation. We may put a law upon the statute-book here requiring him to make such appointments, and this President or another may approve it and it may take the form and shape of a law; but when these trustees come to be appointed by him it would be equally the duty of the Senate to say, that appointment and that law violate the Constitution of the country, and it shall not be a proper subject to be considered in this body whether we will confirm or not the appointees.

The only power that can be exercised authoritatively over the church organizations in this country is clearly defined in the case of Watson vs. Jones, in 13 Wallace's Reports. That is a case of great importance, and if the resolution should go to a committee, as I think it need not go to a committee, I respectfully call the attention of that committee, whatever it shall be—I suppose it will be the Judiciary, if any—to the influence of this case of Watson vs. Jones upon this great question. That was a Kentucky controversy. It arose in a litigation between the authority of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States and the Walnut street church in Louisville, Ky. The question was who had the jurisdiction to determine who were the board of trustees chosen by the church; who were the men who had the legal title to the property held in trust for the congregation; who had the right to select a pastor; who had a right to conduct the financial affairs of the church; who had a right to determine upon the admission of members, their rejection, or any question relating to membership. That case came from the circuit court of the United States on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court, after deliberate consideration, announced certain results as the conclusions to which they arrived, to which I will invite the attention of the Senate very briefly.

I will read some extracts from the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Watson vs. Jones:

> The questions which have come before the civil courts concerning the rights to property held by ecclesiastical bodies may, so far as we have been able to examine them, be profitably classified under three general heads, which, of course, do not include cases governed by considerations applicable to a church established and supported by law as the religion of the State.
> 1. The first of these is when the property which is the subject of controversy has been, by the deed or will of the donor or other instrument by which the property is held, by the express terms of the instrument devoted to the teaching, support, or spread of some specific form of religious doctrine or belief.
> 2. The second is when the property is held by a religious congregation which, by the nature of the organization, is strictly independent of other ecclesiastical associations, and, so far as church government is concerned, owes no fealty or obligation to any higher authority.
> 3. The third is where the religious congregation or ecclesiastical body holding the property is but a subordinate member of some general church organization in which there are superior ecclesiastical tribunals with a general and ultimate power of control more or less complete, in some supreme judicatory over the whole membership of that general organization.
> In regard to the first of these classes it seems hardly to admit of a rational doubt that an individual or an association of individuals may dedicate property by way of trust to the purpose of sustaining, supporting, and propagating definite religious doctrines or principles, provided that in doing so they violate no law of morality and give to the instrument by which their purpose is evidenced the formalities which the laws require. And it would seem also to be the obvious duty of the court, in a case properly made, to see that the property so dedicated is not diverted from the trust which is thus attached to its use. So long as there are persons qualified within the meaning of the original dedication, and who are also willing to teach the doctrines or principles prescribed in the act of dedication, and so long as there is any one so interested in the execution of the trust as to have a standing in court, it must be that they can prevent the diversion of the property or fund to other and different uses. This is the general doctrine of courts of equity as to charities, and it seems equally applicable to ecclesiastical matters.
> In such case, if the trust is confided to a religious congregation of the independent or congregational form of church government, it is not in the power of the majority of that congregation, however preponderant, by reason of a change of views on religious subjects, to carry the property so confided to them to the support of new and conflicting doctrine. A pious man building and dedicating a house of worship to the sole and exclusive use of these who believe in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and placing it under the control of a congregation which at the time hold the same belief, has a right to expect that the law will prevent that property from being used as a means of support and dissemination of the Unitarian doctrine, and as a place of Unitarian worship. Nor is the principle varied when the organization to which the trust is confided is of the second or associated form of church government. The protection which the law throws around the trust is the same. And though the task may be a delicate one and a difficult one, it will be the duty of the court in such cases, when the doctrine to be taught or the form of worship to be used is definitely and clearly laid down, to inquire whether the party accused of violating the trust is holding or teaching a different doctrine, or using a form of worship which is so far variant as to defeat the declared objects of the trust.
> The second class of cases which we have described has reference to the case of a church of a strictly congregational or independent organization, governed solely within itself, either by a majority of its members, or by such other local organism as it may have instituted for the purpose of ecclesiastical government, and to property held by such a church, either by way of purchase or donation, with no other specific trust attached to it in the hands of the church than that it is for the use of that congregation as a religious society.
> In such cases where there is a schism which leads to a separation into distinct and conflicting bodies, the rights of such bodies to the use of the property must be determined by the ordinary principles which govern voluntary associations. If the principle of government in such cases is that the majority rules, then the numerical majority of members must control the right to the use of the property. If there be within the congregation officers in whom are vested the powers of such control, then those who adhere to the acknowledged organism by which the body is governed are entitled to the use of the property. The minority, in choosing to separate themselves into a distinct body, and refusing to recognize the authority of the governing body, can claim no rights in the property from the fact that they had once been members of the church or congregation.

This ruling admits of no inquiry into the existing religious opinions of those who comprise the legal or regular organization; for, if such was permitted, a very small minority, without any officers of the church among them, might be found to be the only faithful supporters of the religious dogmas of the founders of the church. There being no such trust imposed upon the property when purchased or given, the court will not imply one for the purpose of expelling from its use those who by regular succession and order constitute the church, because they may have changed in some respect their views of religious truth.

* * * * * * *

But the third of these classes of cases is the one which is oftenest found in the courts, and which, with reference to the number and difficulty of the questions involved, and to other considerations, is every way the most important.

It is the case of property acquired in any of the usual modes for the general use of a religious congregation, which is itself part of a large and general organization of some religious denomination, with which it is more or less intimately connected by religious views and ecclesiastical government.

The case before us is the one of this class growing out of a schism which has divided the congregation and its officers, and the presbytery and synod, and which appeals to the courts to determine the right to the use of the property so acquired. Here is no case of property devoted forever by the instrument which conveyed it, or by any specific declaration of its owner, to the support of any special religious dogmas, or any peculiar form of worship, but of property purchased for the use of a religious congregation; and so long as any existing religious congregation can be ascertained to be that congregation, or its regular and legitimate successor, it is entitled to the use of the property. In the case of an independent congregation we have pointed out how this identity, or succession, is to be ascertained; but in cases of this character we are bound to look at the fact that the local congregation is itself but a member of a much larger and more important religious organization, and is under its government and control, and is bound by its orders and judgments. There are in the Presbyterian system of ecclesiastical government, in regular succession, the presbytery over the session or local church, the synod over the presbytery, and the general assembly over all. These are called, in the language of the church organs, "judicatories," and they entertain appeals from the decisions of those below, and prescribe corrective measures in other cases.

In this class of cases we think the rule of action which should govern the civil courts, founded in a broad and sound view of the relations of church and state under our system of laws, and supported by a preponderating weight of judicial authority, is that whenever the questions of discipline, or of faith, or ecclesiastical rule, custom, or law have been decided by the highest of these church judicatories to which the matter has been carried, the legal tribunals must accept such decisions as final and as binding on them in their application to the case before them.

Applying the doctrines of this decision to the powers of the church in Utah which is alleged to be an ecclesiastical denomination with certain governing powers in its church organization, are we not bound as the Supreme Court have been bound to accept from that church its decree as to its will and purpose in the conduct and management of the church; and are not the trustees that we put in there bound, as the trustees of Walnut street church were bound by the declaration of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, to execute the will of that great judicatory? What else is the Mormon Church, incorporated under that act of the Legislature of the Territory of Utah, except a great and supreme ecclesiastical judicatory? If it be not polygamous, it is lawful. If it be polygamous, the trustees can not correct polygamy. Such duties do not and can not belong to their office. They claim that the polygamous feature of the Mormon Church is a question of doctrine and faith which the great supreme judicatory has the right to decide, and that it is the practice and not the creed which the laws may touch, and the Supreme Court of the United States would sustain them, if necessary, under this opinion, unless that decision involved absolutely and expressly, or by necessary intendment, the support or propagation of a crime against society in the United States.

We all understand of course that any organization pretending to be a church which undertakes to propagate a crime can not claim the immunity or benefit of being a Christian or religious organization which Congress may not touch. But, sir, the existence of crime in a church does not concern the power of Congress to interpose trustees there. When we acknowledge, as we do in this act, that it is a church having rightfully this supreme judicatory, and that it is a church incorporated by law in which every Mormon in Utah is an incorporator, when having made all these declarations in behalf of that church we for any purpose, whether to purify its morals or to rob it of its property, interpose officers of the Government of the United States there to control its affairs as a board of trustees, we usurp to ourselves a power that even the judiciary have found themselves unable to grasp. The Supreme Court declare expressly that they are bound by the supreme judicatory of a church in matters relating to church government and property and by its decrees, and they have no power to reverse the judgment of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States in respect of the right of control over the Walnut street church. For the reason that this is a subject which under the laws and the Constitution of the country is beyond the reach of legislative power, and also of judical power, it is also beyond the power of the Executive. The President can never constitutionally appoint these officers of the United States to offices created in the Mormon Church with powers to assist in its administration and to report their official conduct to the Secretary of the Interior.

I have thought, Mr. President, that the Senate could well afford to express its opinions upon these resolutions. The country is not going to be quiet after we have asserted on our part the right to interfere by law in the church management of any of the churches that happen to be in Territories within our exclusive jurisdiction. After we have once asserted and maintained by enacting a law that we have the right to put trustees into a church and participate in its management, and that those trustees are not to be selected by the church, are not to be chosen in a manner conformable to its charter or to its principles or method of organization, but they are to be officers of the United States, and as such are to take their seats in a church board, the country can not be quiet while such a declaration, coming from this august body, remains uncontradicted upon the record of our proceedings. I have therefore felt it my duty to call attention to the subject, for we have unwittingly or not—no, not unwittingly, for argument was made against it—spread upon the records of this body the declaration of our power to recognize a church as something that has lawful existence both in morals and in law, and thus recognizing it, to provide for the appointment by the President and confirmation by the Senate of trustees to hold a seat in that board to manage its affairs. Whether it is to manage things temporal or spiritual in a church, Congress can not send the agents of the Government to rule in the affairs of a church.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Senator from Alabama will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is by unanimous consent the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF VICE-PRESIDENT HENDRICKS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to yield to me a moment that I may offer a resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered now.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate the funeral expenses of the late Vice-President Thomas A. Hendricks, which were incurred at Indianapolis, Ind., payment to be made upon vouchers satisfactory to and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to submit any remarks. I merely ask that certain papers which I present may accompany the resolution and go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The papers will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. HOAR. I now move the amendments which were printed for the information of the Senate by the order made on Thursday last.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 57, after the word "counted," it is moved to insert:

Which appear to have been cast by the electors whose names appear on the lists certified by the executive of the State, in accordance with the provisions of section 136 of the Revised Statutes as hereby amended, or in case of a vacancy in the board of electors so certified, then by the persons appointed to fill such vacancy in the mode provided by the laws of the State; or if there be no such list, or if there be more than one such list purporting to be so certified, then those votes, and those only, shall be counted which.

It is also proposed to add as a new section:

SEC. —. That section 136 of the Revised Statutes is amended to read as follows: "SEC. 136. It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified under the great seal of the State, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet."

Mr. HOAR. If I can have the attention of the Senate I think I can state in ten or fifteen minutes the argument in favor of this bill as it will read if amended according to the proposition just read from the desk.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me? Before the Senator proceeds I should like merely to have an understanding about the bill in reference to the admission of Dakota, whether or not the Senator desires to go on to-day until this bill, that is now called up, shall be finished?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to do that. I think we can finish it to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. And have an understanding that the Dakota bill will then be the regular order?

Mr. HOAR. I understand that will be the regular order after this.

Mr. LOGAN. Will that be the regular order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Chief Clerk that the Dakota bill will be the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wished to know, so that we could have it understood.

Mr. HOAR. I hope we may be able to finish this bill to-day. I shall endeavor to secure that result, and I think we can.

This bill is the result of more than twelve years' consideration and discussion in this body. The debate may almost be said to have been in progress during the whole time since the December session of 1875. The bill has passed the Senate three times, I believe, almost unanimously.

The object of the bill is to remove, as far as it is possible to be done by legislation and without an amendment of the Constitution, a difficulty which grows out of an imperfection in the Constitution itself; and I think I may say as a matter now settled by a pretty long experience that the arguments which are made against the bill almost all proceed from supposing that it is an attempt to amend a defect which is due to the Constitution itself and criticising it in that respect, and not reflecting that the bill while it does not of course undertake to intrench upon the provisions of the Constitution, reduces the difficulties which the Constitution has left to a minimum.

Two things we must consider, I think, settled for this generation; first, that the President of the Senate is not clothed by the Constitution with the power to count the electoral vote, that the determination of the grave questions of law and fact which must be decided in order to determine how many electors have been appointed or who has the majority of the votes of those electors has not been committed to any single officer; and, second, that the power to decide these questions and count the vote is not vested exclusively in the House of Representatives. Each of these views has had some advocates. Neither of them, as it seems to me, with great respect to those who entertain them, has ever borne the weight of a constitutional discussion, and neither of them is entertained by any considerable number of persons either in this or the other House. It seems to me that we must take as practical legislators considering the expression of opinion both these propositions as conclusively settled and determined for the present generation.

It is very difficult to any person who remembers the prevalent opinion, the jealousy, the purpose which occupied the mind of the framers of the Constitution, to any person who reads their debates, to suppose that they intended to intrust this vast power to the President of the Senate. Throughout the whole of the history of the formation of the Constitution appears the jealousy of its framers of the usurpation of executive power. The discussions in the Madison Papers and the press of that time, the other discussions which are less celebrated but still are preserved from that generation to ours, all show that the first object of the framers of the Constitution in making it, and their chief stress and labor in commending it to the people, was to show that usurpation or prolongation of power by the Executive of the United States had been rendered impossible in the form of government they had framed.

The contemporaneous State constitutions, established ten or eleven of them between the year 1775 and the close of the year 1787, had, with the only exception of New York—and it may be that there were one or two others—had committed the power of determining who was chosen to the chief executive office to the two houses of the State Legislature.

Of course it will not be forgotten that the Constitution provided for a vote for two candidates for President, one of whom became Vice-President. The President of the Senate would almost always be and would be expected to be one of the chief candidates for the Presidential office. He would have been one of the two principal candidates four years before, and it was the fashion of those days very much more than of these to continue the same person in public trusts and in political candidacy, and several times in our history the Vice-President of the United States has succeeded to the Presidency, Adams to Washington, Jefferson to Adams, Van Buren to Jackson. The conferring upon this officer of the power to determine these great questions would have been a transgression, would have been seen by the framers of the Constitution to be a transgression of that maxim so fundamental that Lord Coke says it is not even in the power of the British Parliament to transgress it—that is, to make a man a judge in his own case—in the most important case of personal interest which could ever be submitted to a human judgment.

When this subject began to assume very important practical shape as the determination of the Presidential election of 1876 approached, a leading member of the Senate, then representing the State of New York, said in his place here that every member of the Senate, except four, stood recorded and committed on his oath against the proposition of the right of the President of the Senate to count the vote, and he further said that the then Senator from California, Mr. Sargent, was the only known advocate of that doctrine on the floor of the Senate.

Taking that, without further discussing it, as practically determined for our guidance as legislators, I think we may further assume with the same confidence that no legislation can be adopted here for a generation which proceeds on the principle that the power to determine this result is lodged in the House of Representatives. The doctrine upon which that claim is based, it seems to me, will not bear discussion. That doctrine is that as the House of Representatives are to exercise a certain function if a certain condition of the vote appears, of course it must follow that that body is to determine upon the state of things which requires the exercise of that function.

I submit that the opposite of that proposition is much more nearly a general truth; that is, that when an official function or duty is lodged in any person or public body, that person or public body is never the judge of the question whether its own power exists or if the case for the exercise of its power has arisen. Neither of these propositions would be universally true; but the latter, it seems to me, most usually is. The Vice-President of the United States, who is to succeed to the Presidential office in case of the inability of the incumbent, surely can not be the sole and exclusive judge of the question whether the time has come for him to exercise that function or whether the House has chosen or has not chosen the President. The persons who are to exercise a power under the forms of a limited, written, and free constitution are almost invariably the persons who are not to determine whether they have got it. The question who is chosen to the Senate or the House is determined by the body to whom that trust is committed, not by the individual claimant, and so on.

Now, sir, if the President of the Senate gets no power in the beginning from the clause which has been so often read and discussed, it seems to me equally clear that he can not get it afterward without legislation. If he have it in the absence of legislation, he has it in spite of legislation. If the Constitution confer on him the power to open the certificates alone, and leaves either to the two Houses or to an officer provided by law the power to count, I can not see any reason, and I never have heard one stated, which, in the failure to exercise that legislative power or in the failure of the two Houses to act, justifies the conclusion that the powers of the President of the Senate should be extended to include a subject not committed to him by the Constitution in the beginning.

This bill assumes—and I do not propose to go over this argument for the hundredth time—that the framers of the Constitution, according to the universal fashion of those days, meant, as the English constitution commits to the two houses of Parliament in case of an abdication as it had been recently settled in the instances of James II and William of Orange, as the State constitutions almost without exception in that day permitted in case of a popular election the right to determine the title to the executive office to be exercised by the two legislative houses—meant to intrust this power to two bodies corporate, the Senate and the House of Representatives. The failure of the Constitution, the casus omissus is the failure to provide an arbiter when these two bodies disagree. The provision for such an arbiter, therefore, comes within the legislative power committed to Congress—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

A perfect bill, as I believe, would provide for a common arbiter between these two bodies, which the Constitution has left to the law-making power, and that has been the attempt of the statesmanship that has dealt with this subject from the beginning of the century to the present day; but every such attempt has failed. There never has assembled at the seat of government since the Government went into operation a Congress whose two Houses would agree as to the person who should be the suitable common arbiter between these two bodies. John Marshall tried it and failed in 1800; Daniel Webster tried it and failed in 1824; the men of 1876 tried it and failed, except for the single occasion with which the electoral commission bill dealt.

Now, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has undertaken by the amendment read by him the other day to solve this difficulty by a provision which shall create a common arbiter between these two branches, and with great respect to that Senator—and there is no man in public life in this country for whom my respect is more profound—it seems to me that of all the schemes which have been ever suggested since the beginning of the Government to deal with this question that of my honorable friend from Ohio is the worst. I would prefer to take the senior justice of the Supreme Court, as John Marshall I think proposed; but I suppose it would be impossible to expect an agreement on that official as an arbiter between the two branches in the present state of political and public sentiment in this country. But certainly whoever is taken, it is a person who is taken for the purpose of exercising a judicial function. I do not mean by "a judicial function" one of the functions usually assigned to courts, but I mean judicial in regard to the nature and character of the act to be performed; that is, you are to have a tribunal which is to determine the existing fact and the existing law, in contradistinction from determining the law or creating the fact according to his own desire. The legislator enacts the law as the legislator desires and thinks best for the public interest. The elector votes for the candidate who it is his wish shall succeed to the office voted for. But this function is to determine the existing fact and apply to it the previously declared and ascertained law. It is a function into which the wish or the desire of the person exercising it can not properly enter.

What does the Senator from Ohio propose for such a function as this? He proposes a very numerous body, a body which is to consist in the near future of nearly five hundred members. It consists now of over four hundred, and after the next census, with the addition of States, it will consist of nearly five hundred members. He proposes a body to deal with questions of frauds at elections, delicate questions of law, State and national, which by no possibility under the circumstances can either debate or give a hearing to any party interested. It is a body made up of earnest partisans, of four hundred or five hundred men selected in the United States more likely than any other body of the same number which could be selected, being brought together on any principle of selection, to have an earnest and impassioned and eager desire as to the result; a body of men whose personal interests, whose success in life, whose future are to be very largely affected by the decision one way or the other of the question before them; a body whose two political divisions are to share or be excluded from the councils of the Executive whose election is to be ascertained by this process—a body I say therefore more likely than any other which could be imagined to be excited by the very disturbing cause which it should be the policy of our legislation to exclude.

It is a body also where individual responsibility is wholly lost. A man who votes in this joint ballot votes with this crowd where his voice can not be heard in debate or to state his reasons, and where his own personality is entirely merged and disappears for the time being. It is a body also with no character of its own to sustain. If this function were committed to the Senate, it would be committed to seventy-six men whose own dignity and honor and authority, whose title to the respect and remembrance of mankind, depend, as we all feel, very largely upon the honor, credit, and dignity of the Senate. A man who fills a place in the Senate and does his best in it has not only the respect and remembrance of his countrymen which belongs to his personal character and quality, but the reflected honor and respect which come to him from being a member of this great legislative body which has existed from the beginning of the Government and is to exist until time shall be no more, in one continuous and unbroken succession; and in the strongest heat of party desire, in the wildest motion of waves of public clamor or the tide of public feeling, the Senators on either side may be trusted for the sake of the preservation of an official and a personal character which is so to survive the chances or the desires or the excitements of a single Presidential election, to do what is right, not what is desired by their party for the time being; and so of the House of Representatives. But this body created by the honorable Senator from Ohio perishes when the single function has been performed. You have therefore as little as possible of security from regard to the personal character of the men taking part in this great proceeding, and no security at all by reason of any dignity of character or permanance of authority of the body to which the function is committed, these persons too taking no oath of office, under no restraint of that kind. The whole of the proposition of my honorable friend from Ohio could be stated by enacting that when the two Houses fail to agree on any question, that question shall be determined without partisan bias and according to the merits, as contested-election cases are usually decided in the House of Representatives!

The Senator says that he takes this proposition; it has been suggested to him by an analogy to the election of Senators of the United States by State Legislatures where they vote in joint ballot. But that is a provision for election, not for judgment. Unquestionably the meeting together of the two Houses, the bodies who are to elect one or the other of two candidates, is not only a proper method, but in the case of differences between the two bodies a necessary method, of arriving at an election; but for judgment, I am not aware that in our legislative history there is any instance where there is committed to a body of this class or to two legislative bodies acting on joint ballot the judicial determination of any public question.

The present bill does not attempt to create a common arbiter between the two Houses of Congress. What it does attempt is to reduce to a minimum the cases where any difference can properly arise, proceeding upon the constitutional theory that the appointment of electors, including the determination of the question who has been appointed, belongs under the Constitution to the States, and that it was intended to exclude not only Congress but every person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States from the whole proceeding. As far as possible this bill remands everything to the State, and simply gives a decisive weight and power to certain official action of the State itself, and if the amendment which I have proposed shall be adopted no case can arise under this bill of rejecting the vote of any State except in the single case of dual State governments.

The bill provides that where the State has created a tribunal for the determination of these questions the proceedings of that tribunal shall be conclusive; that where the State has created no tribunal and there is but one return purporting to come from the State the vote shall not be rejected without the concurrence of both Houses of Congress; and the amendment provides that, in the absence of any State tribunal created for the purpose of passing upon the validity of the election of electors, the vote of that board of electors which has under the existing law the certificate of the executive of the State that they are the truly chosen board shall not be rejected except by the concurrent vote of the two Houses.

I have not heard upon the floor of the Senate, either in private or public discussion, and I have not found in looking over the debates on this question from the beginning of the Government, a suggestion of any possible case which this bill does not cover and determine except the single case where, growing out of civil war or other causes, there is a struggle in a State and a dispute as to who are lawfully exercising the powers of its government. In that case I think we should on reflection be pretty likely to agree that the vote of the State ought not to be received and counted without the assent of both Houses of Congress. It implies an existing civil war, or, if not a civil war, a state of civil disturbance and struggle which is inconsistent almost with any fair or satisfactory ascertainment of the will of the people of such a State. We have had several such instances in the United States, but they came at the close of a civil war, before the relation of the different parties of people in the State to one another or to the National Government had become settled. In that case the bill requires for the reception and count of the vote just what the Supreme Court of the United States held in Luther vs. Borden was required for the determination of which was the lawful State government in regard to all the rest of its relations to the National Government, that is, the recognition of the two Houses of Congress. In Luther vs. Borden it was held that in the absence of such recognition by the two Houses of Congress the recognition by the President of the United States would prima facie determine which was the true and lawful State government.

My honorable friend from Ohio says it is a great thing to reject the vote of a State, and he is not willing to trust to one House of Congress alone, guided, moved as it will be by political passions, the power of rejecting the vote of a State. I should like to ask if the Senator from Ohio knows of any way now under the existing law, of any way since the foundation of the Government, unless he holds to the theory that the President of the Senate has this right (which has been rejected by so large a majority of the persons who have dealt with this question), in which the vote of any State can be counted except by the concurrent assent of the two Houses of Congress? I do not know of any such unless the power were to be usurped or seized upon by the President of the Senate.

In other words, instead of conferring upon one House of Congress the power to reject the vote of a State coming here duly authenticated or in any other way, this bill limits and narrows the power to do that which has been in existence, though never used, from the foundation of the Government. In the case of a dual State government, two bodies claiming each to represent the will of a people, as I said before, I think there are very strong reasons why there should be a concurrence of both Houses before the State should be permitted, when law does not prevail, to take part in this supreme constitutional act—electing the Chief Magistrate for the whole country.

But there is something of a fallacy, it seems to me, lurking in the phrase which we so often hear, "Rejecting the vote of a State." It seems to me that the vote of a State is very much more rejected when you not only exclude the votes of the persons whom it has duly authorized to represent it, but in addition to that permit others whom it has not chosen to cast its vote and express its will without its authority or consent. The vote of a State may be rejected when it is not counted in making up the constitutional result, but the vote of the State is still more rejected when the true vote is cast out and a false vote is counted in its stead.

I believe, Mr. President, that this is all that it seems necessary for me to say at this time in regard to the bill. As it stands, when the executive of the State has made the certificate provided for by the old law, to which we now propose to add the great seal of the State to authenticate the certificate, to a particular body of electors, the vote of that body of electors is to be counted unless both Houses of Congress concur in its rejection; when the State has by a tribunal created by itself settled the question, the action of that tribunal is to govern Congress.

Now, I can not, as I said before, think of any case which this bill does not cover, determine, or remand to the State to determine, any case in which any friction or difficulty can grow out of the mechanism here provided, except in the case of dual State governments, and in regard to that the power of one House to reject the vote is not created by this bill, but it is the only remnant of that power which this bill does not take away.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not care myself to continue this debate, because I feel very much in the condition of every other member of this body in regard to the bill. Whatever we do involves more or less danger, and I respectfully call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts introduces another dangerous element, probably as dangerous as the present provisions of the bill.

In the case of a double return from a State, as where two sets of electors claim to have been legally elected by the people of a State, instead of providing as under the present bill that it shall require the assent of both Houses to count the vote of that State, the amendment proposes to substitute as the only mode and the final mode of testing the question between the opposing colleges of electors, where there is no tribunal provided in the State, the governor of the State must then decide which of the two sets of electors are the legal electors in the State. The Senator seeks to avoid the difficulty which he has pointed out and which is manifest to every one, the danger of allowing either of the two great political bodies to reject the vote of a State; and he now proposes to leave that question to be finally settled by the governor of the State.

Under the one hundred and thirty-sixth section of the Revised Statutes the governor sends to the Vice-President or the President of the Senate the votes of the electors; but suppose another body of electors in the same State, meeting together and claiming to represent the majority of the votes in the State, send their returns, as they can do without the agency of the governor, to the Senate's presiding officer? The bill provides that any paper purporting to be a return shall be received and read and presented before the two Houses of Congress. Instead of leaving that to be decided by the concurrent action of the two Houses, or by the objection of either House, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts leaves it entirely to the governor of the State, who naturally belongs to one of the two parties represented by the two opposing colleges of electors.

My friend from Massachusetts has pointed out many objections, and I can see them very strongly too, to allowing this question to be decided by the presiding officer of the Senate, who has the charge of all the electoral votes; but he proposes as the final arbiter on this important question the governor of a State, who probably himself is one of the parties to the contest. It seems to me he is jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire. Are we willing to leave to one man, who, being the governor of a State, and therefore necessarily a party in the contest that has occurred in the State, to decide this question in which he probably from political feeling or otherwise is more interested than any other mortal man?

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the very point he is now upon was one of the difficulties which we had in the discussion in 1876. Who is the governor? That is the question. There may be two men claiming to be governor in the same State, as there were in Rhode Island once, and as there were in Louisiana. Now, in such a case which certificate is to govern?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Ohio will pardon me, that is provided for by the bill. That is a case left where it requires the concurrent votes of both Houses to count, as I submit it is now. We can not get rid of that. That has been always the difficulty where there were two governors.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I come back to the point, waiving the question proposed by the Senator from Texas, which is a pregnant one, where there are two governors, and when the very election of electors may disclose the fact that there are two opposing candidates for governor, as would naturally be so, because by the laws of nearly all the States the governors are now elected at the same time that the electors are chosen. Nearly all the States have now adopted the mode of conducting the State elections at the same time that the Presidental election is held. The State of Ohio has been the last to abandon its old mode of electing the governor and State officer on a different day from that provided for the election of electors. I think by the laws of nearly all the States the governor is now elected on that day, so that in the very election which involves the election of electors probably the question of who is governor and who was elected governor at that particular time is involved. But suppose the governor is admitted to be duly elected, representing one of the parties of the State, especially of a great State, you leave to him the question of deciding this most dangerous and difficult point.

We can not overcome the difficulty by such a proposition as this. Let the Senator from Massachusetts point out some tribunal. It may be the Supreme Court; it may be an electoral commission organized under law; it may be a tribunal pointed out by the law beforehand in the nature of a judicial tribunal or some other kind of tribunal; but to leave the question in dispute to be decided by the governor of a State, it seems to me only involves this matter in greater difficulty. In cases which may arise where honesty of opinion and sincerity of conviction may exist in both parties, where there is a real dispute as to who have been elected electors for a particular State, it seems to me to select the governor of the State to decide the question is far more dangerous than to leave it even to the presiding officer of the Senate. So all the arguments which the Senator has used to show that the presiding officer of the Senate ought not to decide the question arise also as against the authority to give the governor of a State the power to decide the question. It seems to me that that will not answer, and that the remedy proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, who admits the evil and the difficulty, is not a remedy at all, but only aggravates the disease.

In the face of the mandate of the Constitution that when the electoral votes are read before the two Houses, with all the formalities that can surround this grave political event, "the votes shall then becounted," the Senator from Massachusetts turns around and says that the votes certified to by the governor shall be counted. It seems to me that is not sufficient. It is not a remedy. On the other hand, I would far rather say that no vote of any State shall be excluded except by the concurrent vote of both Houses.

In the case of a single return, although that return may disclose an illegal election, although it may disclose the election of persons who were not eligible to the position of elector, although it may involve grave difficulties and doubts as to the election or as to the validity of the return, this very bill provides that the vote shall be counted unless both Houses agree that it shall not be counted. Now I would far rather apply that principle to the case put. On the contrary, the Senator proposes to amend the bill so as to make the clause read:

> And in such case of more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State, if there shall have been no such determination of the question in the State aforesaid, then those votes, and those only, shall be counted which appear to have been cast by the electors whose names appear on the lists certified by the executive of the State, in accordance with the provisions of section 136 of the Revised Statutes as hereby amended.

So it provides that in case of a double return the vote certified by the governor of the State shall be the vote to be counted, and under the operations of this provision even with both Houses concurring that the governor of the State is wrong, that he has disregarded the will of the people of the State of which he is governor, the two Houses concurring could not overrule the decision of the executive of the State. It seems to me that this is a more dangerous complication.

On the whole, without extending this debate further, this matter is surrounded by many difficulties. When I proposed the other day that the question should finally be decided by the two Houses acting in a joint convention I was not entirely satisfied, because I could see that that involved great difficulties. But suppose, as the bill stood, the House of Representatives should say that a certain vote should not be counted; in that case it would be the end of it; it would be excluded from the count, whatever opinion the Senate might have; but if, on the contrary, the Senate should come to a different opinion from the House, then at least there would be one other chance, by convening the two Houses in joint convention, of having a settlement and a determination of the question, and not merely a rejection of the vote. As the bill stands, when either House objects the vote is not counted—that is, it is excluded from the count, and the State has no part or lot in the election of a President. In the amendment I proposed I provided for at least one rehearing of the question in case the two Houses disagree, when the Senate mingling with the House in joint convention might to some extent control or affect the vote. I admitted that it was not a sufficient remedy; I did not like to see the Senate merged in the House; still it gave an additional safeguard, and then it gave a decision of the question so that the vote of the State was counted, and therefore was better than the proposition contained in the bill. Still I was not satisfied.

Now, I think if this amendment is adopted it will only make still more dangerous the difficulties that surround this count. It leaves the executive or governor of a State to decide the very question which we are not willing to leave to the two Houses to decide, which we are not willing to leave to either House to decide. It would be far better to take the expedient proposed by me than to take this, because it is certainly better to leave to the two Houses of Congress, two great political bodies representing all the people of the United States and who are to a large extent entirely disinterested, to decide this local controversy in a State, rather than to leave it to a governor of a State, who himself is necessarily a party to that controversy, to decide it.

The proposition of my friend from Massachusetts violates the very rule that he has quoted here as laid down by Lord Coke, that even Parliament can not make any man a judge in his own case. Yet this amendment provides that the governor of a State is the judge of the election as to which of two sets of electors is elected, and the governor himself is a party necessarily to the controversy.

But, as I said before, I do not wish to continue this discussion further. I do not believe that in the present condition of the bill we are likely to come to any wise solution of it. I would rather recommit the bill to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which I know would approach this question with great care. At any rate, I trust that we shall not now be forced to vote upon propositions that are not satisfactory to the Senate. I would very much rather let the bill go over for a while, so that we may look into it and see whether some provision can not be agreed on for fixing upon a tribunal. I would rather take the Supreme Court of the United States, as much as I object to drawing that great tribunal into this controversy, because that court would at least give a decision; it would say which of two returns should be counted; but if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is adopted it will be placed beyond the power of the two Houses to overrule the interested mandate of the governor of a State. If no other expedient can be adopted, I would say that some vote should be counted, that the Constitution should be obeyed, "that the votes shall then be counted," rather than to say that either House may by its arbitrary veto reject the vote, or, in other words, exclude it from being counted.

I therefore respectfully submit to my honorable friend from Massachusetts that he has not helped the matter any by his amendment, but has left it a source of dangerous dispute, and has selected a tribunal the last of all to decide this grave question.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me, with the profound respect which I always entertain for my honorable friend, that his suggestion hardly indicates the reflection which he is in the habit of giving to such matters. This body has been engaged dealing with this question nearly thirteen years. It has debated it week after week, month after month some sessions, and at last it has three times passed this bill, after discussion, by a vote approaching to unanimity. Now my honorable friend thinks we had better put it off a little longer, recommit the bill to the committee, and see if we can not do something better. I submit that when a bill comes, at the end of twelve years' debate, three times adopted by the Senate of the United States, adopted by the committee which has had it in charge, reported to the Senate, stood on its Calendar six or eight weeks, the Senate is prepared to deal with that question if it ever is fit to deal with any question, and that it is not a case for recommitments or dreams overnight; it is a case for the judgment and decision of the Senate.

My honorable friend says it is a great inconsistency to deny the President of the Senate a power which you permit to the executive of a State. In the first place, it is the Constitution which denies that power to the President of the Senate, not the bill, in the judgment of most persons who have reflected upon this subject. In the next place, the cases are very different.

If the President of the Senate is to count the vote he is to decide who is chosen President of the United States, and there is to be given to him the full and final control of controversies which in our ordinary political history are to be controversies between him and one other man, the question whether he himself is chosen to the foremost office on the face of the earth, a choice more an object of ordinary human desire than any coronet, or crown, or star.

The belief that the Constitution, framed by men so jealous of executive power and executive usurpation, denied to a man interested in that question the function of being the sole judge to decide it the Senator likens to the case where the executive of a single State is permitted to certify whom that State has chosen for Presidential electors, having no relation to any of the rest of the elections in the country, and to have the certificate prima facie.

In the first place, I suppose the Senator agrees with me that this is a matter for the State; that the State ought to decide, should decide, and should be respected in deciding the question for itself; and that that bill is the best which remands that decision entirely to the State.

Now, this bill does not give any weight, authority, or dignity whatever to the certificate of the State executive unless the State which he represents has so chosen, because it provides that the State, in the first instance, may appoint another tribunal for the purpose, which implies the desire of the State itself that its executive should be its constitutional voice and authority upon this question that the bill respects. In other words, the bill only gives this prima facie authority to the State executive when the State itself chooses to repose that authority in him.

Will the Senator from Ohio himself deny that if the State of Ohio puts upon its statute-book, "It is hereby enacted that the votes for Presidential electors shall be counted and certified by the governor, and that count and certificate shall be conclusive," that would be something which we could not and should not go behind? The bill does nothing but that in substance, saying to the State: "Appoint your own judicature in your own fashion to determine this question; if you do not do it, we shall assume that you desire that the certificate of your governor shall determine it," and that is all the bill says.

The same authority is given to the certificate of the governor of a State in a thousand other cases. The governor's certificate comes here to the Senate to the credentials of a Senator, and although the Constitution gives the Senate a final judgment in that case, that is usually all that is required and the Senator takes his seat. It is a prima facie case; he sits in the Senate and votes and acts; at any rate, he is in his place. But a still stronger case is the election of the delegation to the House of Representatives. The New York or Ohio or Pennsylvania delegation comes up with the certificate of their governor, changing the entire control of the legislative power in one branch of the Congress of the United States, and those Representatives are put on the roll by the Clerk, they take part in the organization of the House, in the election of a Speaker, which involves the appointment of committees, and sit for weeks and months, even if there is a dispute or contest in their case, until that matter is decided.

So I say that this only is adopting the principle which the Constitution adopts. It only gives this power to the governor when the State itself desires it shall be reposed there, and it is only following the analogies and precedents which in all other like cases from the foundation of the Government have prevailed.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there any constitutional objection to the Legislature of a State authorizing the governor himself to appoint the electors?

Mr. HOAR. Not the slightest. It is perfectly within the power of the Legislature of a State.

Mr. TELLER. Or for the Legislature themselves to elect the electors?

Mr. HOAR. Or for the Legislature to elect them themselves. But the point of the question of the Senator from Ohio relates to the executive of the State. If he will pardon me, he seems not to reflect. We find here a constitutional difficulty never to be cured without a constitutional amendment. Congress after Congress, from 1800 down to the present time, have wrestled and labored with that difficulty. This is the only solution which seems likely ever to be agreed upon. I should unite with the Senator in agreeing to have either the Supreme Court or the senior justice of the court come in as an arbiter between the two bodies, but the Senator knows as well as I do that it is perfectly hopeless to expect to get any legislation to that effect.

In regard to this bill the Senator says, in other words, here are a hundred difficulties; you have cured ninety-nine of them—at any rate he does not submit any argument to the Senate to show that we have not done so well and properly—but the hundredth still remains; and because you do not to my satisfaction deal with that I shall not join you in the measure which at least disposes of the ninety-nine. That seems to be the substance of the argument of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts himself admits that the bill, which has been the result of thirteen years' deliberation, is not satisfactory; that it is weak in the most vital point.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me; I do not admit any such thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator by introducing this amendment admitted it.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator means that a little amendment of detail is an admission of anything——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, when I say the bill is not satisfactory, I do not mean to say that it is not the most satisfactory legislation that either I or any man can frame. I think it is. I say that what is not satisfactory is the condition of the constitutional provision on this subject, which commits a question to the decision of two bodies politic and does not provide for any common arbiter. That is the unsatisfactory thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I commence again as I started a moment ago. The Senator admits it by introducing an amendment entirely foreign to the bill, which no one heretofore has proposed in the thirteen years of debate to try this initial point, this governing point of the whole controversy, proposing a new arbiter in the governor of a State where a contest exists. This amendment comes from him, and we respect his opinions greatly, but it seems to me that the amendment itself ought to undergo the careful revision of the committee of which he is the chairman to see whether they would be satisfied to turn over this controversy from the two Houses to the governor of a State. But he says the governors of the States certify to our elections as Senators and to the election of members of the other House of Congress. So the governor does, purely as an administrative officer, and upon that certificate a Senator may be sworn in for a month or a day, and the members of the other House may be sworn in or turned aside even without being sworn in. That certificate is only prima facie evidence of the facts contained in it; it is not at all conclusive. But this proposition is to make the action of the governor of a State final and conclusive, so that the two Houses acting in concert can not overrule that decision, because it expressly provides that the two Houses when met together for the express purpose of counting the vote shall not count any paper except that certified to by the governor. In other words, it is conclusive and final upon the two Houses and upon the people of the United States.

I say that when the Senator proposes this amendment he enter a cognovit, a confession, that the plan heretofore, after thirteen years' consideration and debate, was faulty in the vital part of it; and that some provision must be devised by him to meet this difficulty. Everybody knows, no one better than the Senator himself, that I have great respect for him and for his opinion; but when he comes to a question that may affect peace or war, the existence of the United States, the election of a President, I do think that this measure ought to be surrounded with greater guards. If, going a little step further, he would provide that the return shall be received which shall be approved or certified after a trial before the supreme court of the State itself, and that the court shall decide between two opposing returns, I can see that there might be a solution of the difficulty. For ninety years, or whatever has been the period of our history, the certificate of the governor has been sent to us, but it was simply the certificate of the governor in the performance of an administrative duty, not binding upon either House, disregarded time and time again in our history, even in the election of a single Representative, and especially in the election of a Senator. But now, in the election of a President it is proposed to give the executive of a State the power to control that vote, when before that power is exercised the governor will know that the vote of that State may decide the election of a President.

It seems to me, therefore, that this is not a sufficient remedy, and that after our thirteen years' debate we have not reached a point where the other House or the Senate can be satisfied with the solution that is proposed of this most difficult problem. The Senator himself, it seems to me, concedes that by offering the amendment at this time.

I do not wish to prolong this debate, because I have said all that I desire to say on the subject, and I am willing to abide by the judgment of the Senate; but I believe it would be wiser to let this matter go over for further consideration or to recommit it and let us have the opinion of the Committee on Privileges and Elections as to whether the amendment now proposed, so vital and important, is the best that they can offer. Then we could decide—certainly not now. The Senator proposes to dispose of this matter to-day, when a proposition is made more decisive, more summary, more powerful in the hands of a single man than any that has yet been proposed. I am not prepared to consider it in a hurry. I hope therefore that this measure will go over until some further light can be thrown upon it, and let us see if it is the best of all the wisdom of the Senate of the United States that this matter should be committed to the governor of a State, not by the consent of the State or by the law of the State, because the law of the State would probably not leave to the governor this decisive action. I doubt whether the Legislature of any State would give to the governor the power either to appoint the electors or to decide finally and conclusively who have been chosen electors in the State.

Mr. HOAR. Where do you find that in the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment expressly provides that no vote shall be counted in the case of a double return except the vote certified by the governor.

Mr. HOAR. It is only where the State leaves it to him. It provides before that that the State may appoint its own tribunal.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Will my friend allow me, in order that we may understand each other? I do not like to interrupt him, but I should like to understand him and I should like to have him understand me. I put to him this direct question: Suppose the State of Ohio by her Legislature enacts that her governor shall count the vote for electors, and that his certificate shall be conclusive, are you not in favor of making it conclusive yourself under those circumstances?

Mr. SHERMAN. In the first place, if the Senator has got through, no State would repose that power in the executive. The Senator is supposing if it would do it, if Ohio would do it. Ohio would never do it.

Mr. HOAR. My friend will pardon me, that is all the bill does. This bill says that if Ohio leaves it to the governor, then the governor's certificate shall be conclusive. If she does not leave it to the governor, then his certificate will not be conclusive and will have no effect. I should like to repeat. I ask the Senator not to answer me by saying he thinks it is improbable it will happen, because that is as good an argument against him as it is against me. If it does happen that Ohio says, either in terms or by implication, "I want my governor to settle this question," are you not in favor of executing what the bill says shall be done?

Mr. SHERMAN. Such a position has never been taken in all this controversy for the last thirteen years. If the Senator is willing to say that the governor of a State shall decide all these controversies in case of double returns or in case of single returns, then, as a matter of course, there is no need for all the magnificent ceremony that is provided for by the Constitution. The intendment of the Constitution, as the Senator has reasoned over and over again, is that the two Houses shall count the vote; and now we propose to tie the hands of the two Houses and to say that they shall not count the vote, but they shall only count conclusively those votes which are certified to by the governors of the States. If that is to be the law, and that is the end of it all, then what is the use of having a law? Why not say "the vote shall then be counted as certified by the governors of the respective States," if that is the construction you propose to give to the Constitution?

But, on the other hand, the Constitution provides some other mode of dealing with it. It provides that the returns shall be received and held by the presiding officer of the Senate; that they shall be presented to the two Houses of Congress; and an imposing array is made there to see it done. Does the Constitution say that the governor of a State shall then count the votes, or that the votes certified by the governors shall then be counted? Not at all. If a State chooses to repose in its chief executive magistrate the power to decide these questions, that is quite a different thing. I may perhaps admit that in certain cases the State itself might invest the governor with powers of choosing electors, as the State may impose upon the Legislature that power; but that has never been done since the foundation of the Government. The executive officer of the State simply returns what appears upon the face of the record, and we, the two Houses of Congress, pass upon the validity of those returns.

We say, according to the doctrine of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, which of those votes shall be counted; and now, as the end of this controversy, it is proposed to turn it over and take the report and decision of the governor of a State as final and conclusive. If so, then it does not make any difference about the two Houses meeting, it does not make any difference about the custody of the electoral returns, which are so safely guarded; all we have got to do is to receive a polite note from the governor of the State of Ohio, for instance, that such and such men were electors, and such and such men did vote so and so; and that is to be final and conclusive, even though both Houses may be of opinion that the governor has usurped authority and has falsely certified returns or manufactured them. So I submit that after all the Senator has not solved the problem.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, one word only. The Senator from Ohio seems to me to entirely overlook the constitutional purpose of the founders of our Government. They meant to take away from Congress, from executive, from national officers, as far as they possibly could, as far as the wit of man could contrive, any control over this matter at all. They said that the electors should not come to the national capital, but should meet at the capitals of their States and vote, and that they should all vote on the same day, so that one State should not be affected by the act of another; that no one holding an office of trust or profit under the United States should have anything to do with the selection of the President of the United States. It is the one place in the Constitution where State right, State authority, State independence was carefully preserved to the exclusion of any national or central authority whatever.

To that we all agree. And they were so confident that this thing would come to the seat of government from the States settled that they said the President of the Senate shall open these votes, and they supposed almost that they would count themselves, that "the votes shall then be counted," the mere arithmetical enumeration of those votes being in their eyes so unimportant and so a matter of course that it did not occur to them even to say in words who should do it.

That being the case, what does the bill do? The bill says to the State, "Questions have arisen in our historical experience in regard to your voice. Now, you may do one of two things. You may create another tribunal with express authority to settle that question, in which case the decision of that tribunal shall prevail, or you may leave it on your governor's certificate, just as you please." The bill says, therefore, that in case the State declines to appoint any other tribunal and chooses to leave it on the governor's certificate, we will leave it where the State has left it.

That being the condition of the bill, I put this question to my honorable friend from Ohio when he was up just now, Will you take the responsibility of saying yourself in argument, while you are attacking this bill, that you are opposed to doing exactly that thing; and will you say that if the State of Ohio or any other says, "I wish this thing to be settled by my governor's certifiate," you will oppose its being done? Yet you object to the principles of the bill. Although the question was propounded to the Senator three times he was unwilling to say that he would not, but he met it by saying he does not think it is very probable that the State could safely let its governor appoint the electors, much more count the vote and decide afterward. I asked the Senator, "Do you object to that, if the State does it?" The Senator says, "It is not likely the State will ever do it."

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish my proposition, and then I will answer the Senator. It may be true that it is not likely that the State will do that; but if in that improbable case, however, of the State doing it, the Senator would not object to it, and thinks it ought to be permitted, does not his whole argument against the bill as proposed to be amended fail? If it is not likely that the State would do it, then the contingency provided for never arises, and we have got the main portion of the bill which provides for the case settled in the State by the State tribunal. Now I will answer the Senator's question.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is the question I wish to ask: The bill does not propose that the State shall confer upon its governor this power. That is one thing. The bill proposes to confer that power by act of Congress, and I doubt very much whether it can confer any such power.

Mr. HOAR. I thought my friend wanted to ask a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that question, whether Congress can confer upon a governor of a State a power of this kind which has not been granted by the State?

Mr. TELLER. The bill does not do that.

Mr. HOAR. The bill does not do that. That, it seems to me, is a mere question of phraseology. Then the only point of the Senator's labored argument is this, the difference between an express statute authorizing the Governor to make the certificate and have it conclusive, and the State's leaving it to the governor by refraining to create any other tribunal after this act of Congress has pointed out what, if that tribunal is created, it shall do. In other words, by the admission of my honorable friend from Ohio, his labored criticism and attack on the bill is reduced to exactly this, that he thinks there is a certain important difference between the case where the State of Ohio, having it in its power to create some other tribunal or to confer this power expressly on the governor, does the latter, and the case where the State of Ohio, having it in its power to create some other tribunal or leave it to the governor without an express enactment, does the latter. It seems to me the argument disappears.

Mr. INGALLS obtained the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts and of the Senate itself to the fact that the electors have nothing to do with the governor of a State. The electors send their votes directly to the President of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. My friend will pardon me; that is provided for in the bill. The governor of a State has a great deal to do with the electors. The governor of a State is bound by the law which has been in existence since 1792, or whatever is the date of the original law, to give three copies, three certificates to the board of electors whom he finds to be chosen. Those three papers are annexed under the statute of the United States to the electors' certificate of their votes. One of them is sent here by a messenger, one of them is sent here by mail, and one is deposited in the office of the clerk of the district court of the United States. Those are the certificates which the President of the Senate opens, and those are the certificates which are counted in the absence of anything to overthrow them.

Mr. SHERMAN. According to the laws of the United States the governor has nothing to do with the vote of the electors. He certifies and makes out three lists of electors, which he gives to the electors, just as he certifies who are elected members of Congress. He gives those lists to the electors who he thinks are elected, but from that time forward the governor has nothing to do with the electors. The returns are not made to the governor. You will have to change your law so that the returns of the electors shall be made to the governor and certified to the governor.

Mr. HOAR. Now, my honorable friend misunderstands me.

Mr. SHERMAN. Wait until I get through.

Mr. INGALLS. Where am I?

Mr. SHERMAN. I know this conversational debate between us——

Mr. GEORGE. Is very instructive.

Mr. SHERMAN. May not present the points, but I wish again to call attention to the fact that the governor has nothing to do with the electors. He is not a member of the electoral college; he has nothing to do with it. The electors meet and send their proceedings not to the governor. The governor may not know even who the electors are. He certifies here that the electors met and voted, and sends it to the presiding officer of the Senate, and they are never opened except in the presence of the two Houses, when "the vote shall then be counted." The interposition of this amendment would require the electoral vote to be certified to the governor and then by the governor to the presiding officer of the Senate. It would change the whole character of our electoral college.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, one minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Ohio certainly has not read the bill and amendment. The present law authorizes the governor, as the Senator states, to deliver to the electors his certificate. The electors annex their votes to it and send it here. The bill provides not that there shall be a certificate by the governor after the vote of the electors, but that the vote of those electors to which the governor's previous certificate of their election is annexed shall be the one prima facie to be counted. Now, if the learned Senator supposes that this proposition requires any submission of the vote of the electors to the governor after they have voted, it shows that he has not read or comprehended the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I move to commit the bill to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. In support of that motion I venture to suggest the surprise I felt at the impatience with which the Senator from Massachusetts appeared to resent the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio that there should be further deliberation upon this measure, which he said had already engaged the attention of the Senate for more than thirteen years, the inference being, I assume, that the perfection of human wisdom had been reached, and that any attempt to reach higher excellence could not result in advantage to the Senate or in any wiser solution of the confessed difficulties by which this question is surrounded.

When I reflected that this bill from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which had been thrice passed by the Senate by a vote, as the Senator informs us, practically unanimous, had been by his own motion within forty-eight legislative hours proposed to be amended by a provision that would have given two of the votes of Oregon in 1877 to Mr. Hayes and one to Mr. Tilden—a provision that the certificate of the governor of the State should be conclusive upon this great tribunal—I confess I was still more amazed at the Senator's unwillingness for further deliberation.

When I remembered that within ten days we have passed a measure dealing with one branch of this important subject, the succession by inheritance to the Presidential office, a bill, prepared by that Senator, and passed with such haste through this body that there was insufficient opportunity for consideration, so that a defect has already been discovered so obviously in violation of what was intended that an amendment is suggested, I confess that my surprise was increased to hear that procrastination or delay would result in some fatal disaster in the solution of this great problem.

Under the bill providing for the Presidential succession it is now admitted that in case the President and Vice-President elect should die before they were installed into office the out-going Secretary of State would hold that term for the four years for which the President and Vice-President were elected, a result that never was contemplated, an event provision for which never would have been omitted had the Senate had opportunity of considering whether it was one of the issues that was to be made effectual by the enactment of that statute.

So, Mr. President, I think we may not lose by delay. This matter has been debated since 1789. It will continue to be debated, no matter what action may be taken by the Senate, until there is a constitutional amendment, a change in the organic law that shall entirely take the subject out of its present attitude and place it where it should be placed, in accordance with the predetermined will of the American people. So the Senator need not comfort or console himself by the expectation that by any piece of legislative patchwork we can adopt here debate upon this great question is to come to an end.

The Senate seems to be in this matter in a mood of self-abnegation. As I understand the Constitution, each of the individuals and each of the constituent bodies composing this great electoral tribunal are charged with the responsibility of assuming jurisdiction of whatever parts of constitutional duty may fall upon them, which no law can affect. When the Constitution imposes a duty upon an officer he must be the judge of the time and method of discharging that duty, subject to his final responsibility to the people.

The Electoral Commission of 1877 was a contrivance that will never be repeated in our politics. It was a device that was favored by each party in the belief that it would cheat the other, and it resulted, as I once before said, in defrauding both. The Democratic majority in the House of Representatives at that time never would have consented to the creation of that tribunal had they not supposed that the fifteenth member of the commission, under the provisions of that statute, was in favor of the election of Samuel J. Tilden. We all know the providential interposition by which that great and good man David Davis, of Illinois, was removed from that tribunal and translated to a happier sphere. In the dispensations of Providence he was transferred from the bench of the Supreme Court to the Senate of the United States after the passage of the bill, and thus the fifteenth man upon the tribunal was in favor of the election of Mr. Hayes to the Presidency. That is the way that seven to eight became changed to eight to seven. I have heard much about the patriotism of the Democratic party in that contest, and the moderation of its candidate in consenting to this measure and renouncing the Presidency, but I venture to say that could they have foreseen in December, 1876, when that bill was passed, what the transmutations of politics were to bring about there never would have been a concurrence on the part of the House of Representatives in the enactment of the electoral commission bill. It was a fatal error under the Constitution for the Democratic party; and the bill we are now considering is but a faint and feeble and fragile imitation of the Electoral Commission.

I shall be instructed far beyond my expectations if some great constitutional lawyer, profoundly familiar with the inner consciousness of the framers of our Government, can assure me how any legislative enactment that we may adopt now or at any time can in any manner whatever bind that great political tribunal which is to meet to declare the result of the Presidential election in 1888. Here is the fundamental difficulty in my mind about all these propositions. The function that is to be performed by the electors of the President and Vice-President of the United States is a political function exercised by the people of the United States acting in their primary capacity; it is a function that is reserved to them in terms by the Constitution itself, and whether the President of the Senate is to count the vote, whether the vote is to be counted by the Senate and House of Representatives separately or jointly, whether it is to be counted by the tribunal proposed by the Senator from Ohio, the fact still remains that the vote is to be counted, and that no act can be passed by any antecedent Congress that can deprive either of the persons or any of those great constituent bodies of the powers that they possess and which they are directed to exercise under and by virtue of the twelfth article of the amendments to the Constitution.

I heard the Senator from Massachusetts say that we can not confer nor impair this jurisdiction, and I agree with him upon that. No tribunal, no legislative enactment can determine, nor has ever attempted to determine, whether the President of the Senate shall count the vote or not. That officer must decide this question for himself; and, although I disapproved the declaration made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in his capacity as President pro tempore of this body in February last, although I believe it was an unnecessary act of renunciation on behalf of the Senate, a practical abdication of a power that might reasonably be inferred to belong to this body or to its presiding officer, and which many believed did so belong to it, I admit that he had the right to make it, because the duty was devolved upon him by the Constitution to determine for himself whether he would count that vote or whether he would not. If I had been in that position I would have counted it had the issue been left with me. Let me read what he said. After announcing the state of the vote he continued:

> And the President of the Senate makes this declaration only as a public statement in the presence of the two Houses of Congress of the contents of the papers opened and read on this occasion, and not as possessing any authority in law to declare any legal conclusion whatever.

No sovereign ever laid down scepter and crown more absolutely, more unnecessarily, more in derogation of what might have been lawfully claimed to be the constitutional functions of the President of the Senate than was done by the Senator from Vermont on that occasion. It had never been determined by any tribunal, it had never been decided by any competent authority, that the phrase "the vote shall then be counted" might not by an absolutely justifiable inference have been held to mean that the President of the Senate, being the custodian of those votes, having the right to open them, had also the right to count them; and in the great contests of the future emergencies may arise, emergencies are not unlikely to arise in the state of the law on this subject, when it might be well not to be confronted by that pernicious precedent. This body by no expression of opinion upon any occasion, either then or at any other time, had renounced its authority through its presiding officer to count the votes in his custody in the presence of the two Houses, and therefore, although I think this act was not warranted by any decision of the Senate, it can not be denied that under the Constitution the Senator from Vermont, as President of the Senate, had the right to do what he did, because he was in the discharge of a duty under the Constitution that he was compelled to decide for himself and that no person could decide for him.

I heard the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] on a previous day speak, I thought with something like idolatry, of the wisdom of the framers of this Government in the devices that they had contrived for determining the election of President and Vice-President, and he warned us with something of pathetic admonition against the dangers, the sacrilege, the impiety of venturing to offer any amendment to this system that was so near the perfection of human wisdom. Mr. President, the memory of those great men who formed our Constitution is venerated and revered. They made a sublime innovation in government that has formed an epoch in the upward progress of the human race. They had no precedents for their experiment, whose success has been one of the great wonders and marvels of the politics of the world. But they were human, and if their statesmanship and their wisdom has no stronger foundation on which to rest than the contrivance they devised for electing a President and Vice-President of the United States and determining the questions arising thereunder, the tenure, the succession by inheritance, the question of inability, then, sir, their reputation rests upon a very fragile and insecure and insubstantial foundation, for public attention can not be too frequently nor too forcibly directed to the dangers which threaten not only the peace but the perpetuity of this Government from the defective and uncertain state of the law governing the question of Presidential elections, succession, and inheritance.

Twice already in our brief history, once in 1801 by the possible failure to elect a President at all, and again in 1877 by the possible failure to determine the result of a disputed Presidential election before the close of the preceding term, we have been brought to the very verge and brink of revolution. The first crisis resulted in what is now known as the twelfth article of amendments to the Constitution, and the second, as I have before said, was averted by the invention of the Electoral Commission, which had no precedent and will have no successor.

In further illustration of the organic defects in the Constitution on this general subject, let me refer for a moment to the condition of the law upon the question of Presidential inability. In case of the removal, resignation, death, or inability of the President the Vice-President is to succeed to the powers and duties of that office. Who is to decide when inability occurs: its nature, extent, duration, and end? What law could be enacted to take away from the Vice-President of the United States the absolute duty under the Constitution of determining for himself when inability of the President occurs? Who doubts that in 1881, from the 2d day of July until the 19th day of September in that year, the inability of President Garfield was absolute under the Constitution in the full meaning of that term? He was sequestered for eighty days, in a seclusion as silent as the tomb to which he was so soon to be consigned. He was as incapable of performing any executive act as his marble effigy in the Hall of Statues, that is to transmit to posterity the memory of his triumphs and of his martyrdom. Only once during that long period did his failing hand trace in wavering characters the letters of his name. Here was a case of absolute inability under the Constitution. The event contemplated by the Constitution had occurred. And I believe that under that instrument, when James A. Garfield sank to the floor of the railroad station penetrated by the bullet of the assassin, the powers and duties of the Presidential office devolved, under the Constitution, upon Chester A. Arthur. Fortunately, sir, difficulty was averted. The world was at peace. The composure of the American people during that perilous period was a convincing and added proof of their capacity for self-government. But we had no President; we had no Vice-President who had entered upon the discharge of the powers and duties of the President. We were without an executive head. There was no law governing that subject. And yet does any one who recalls the slumbering passions of that epoch suppose for an instant that had there been any emergency, any exigency requiring the performance of executive functions, Mr. Chester A. Arthur could have gone to the door of the White House and peaceably entered upon the discharge of the powers and duties that had devolved upon him under the Constitution? I do not. I am convinced that any such attempt on his part while the breath of life remained in the body of James A. Garfield would have precipitated a convulsion in our politics that would have been pregnant with unknown disasters and perils to the Republic.

One thing further, sir:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

As has been observed, the silence as to the person, or the body, or the tribunal by whom that computation is to be made is absolute. It is left entirely to inference, to be decided by the persons upon whom that duty may devolve under the Constitution. It can not be made any more certain, it can not be made any more positive, nor can it be abrogated or removed by anything that we can do in the premises; and we can pass no statute and make no enactment that will in any way interfere with or change or modify the will of that high tribunal when it may next meet in the discharge of the duties devolved upon it under the Constitution.

> The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representative shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President.

Who is to decide whether any person has a majority or not? Who is to decide who are the three highest on the list that have been balloted for heretofore? Take the case of 1877. Supposing there had been no Electoral Commission, if those certificates had been opened, if the votes had been counted by the tellers at the desk, who was to decide when the emergency arrived which devolved that power upon the House of Representatives? Could any act of Congress, recent or remote, have determined that? Could any act of Congress deprive or take away anything from the power of the House of Representatives to determine for themselves whether there had been an election or not, which of the three candidates on the list were those having the highest votes, and which of those should be elected by the exercise of the power confided to them by the Constitution?

Careful consideration of this subject will convince any thoughtful student of the Constitution that the scheme which has been devised and which now remains in our organic law is fatally defective, and that nothing can be done by way of legislation to cure the inevitable evils by which it is surrounded, and the more we proceed by legislation to patch, to bridge over apparent difficulties, to abbreviate the number of perils which surround it, by so much we retard and delay the exercise of the power which the people must ultimately be called upon to perform in adopting some system that shall remove the perils in which it is now environed.

A casual survey of the debates in the convention which formed our Constitution discloses a singular condition of doubt and uncertainty upon this subject. No less than ten methods of choosing a President were seriously proposed and debated. As the article stood within four days after the convention met and as it remained down to within less than two weeks before it adjourned in September, the National Executive was to be elected by the National Legislature for the term of seven years, and was to be ineligible for another election, and it was not until near the close of the convention, when the rights of the smaller and the larger States began to be in controversy and the people in the Southern States saw that by reason of the exclusion of the negroes from the voting population they were to be at a disadvantage, that this device of an electoral college was finally agreed upon as a compromise for the purpose as far as possible of taking away the power of choosing their President by a direct vote of the people themselves.

It was supposed that these men called electors would be selected from the most virtuous, the most discreet, the most upright, and the most "continental" persons, as the phrase then employed was, who should assemble apart from the people, like a conclave of cardinals who choose a pope, and then in the deliberations of their councils canvass the merits of the best citizens in the country for the chief executive office, and finally select him without any popular interference whatever. This plan lasted just twelve years. George Washington received all the electoral votes; but in 1800 parties were organized and a Presidential caucus was held, and from that time to this the electoral system has been débris; it is rubbish. The electors under the Constitution are puppets. They are like the marionettes in a Punch and Judy show. The entire functions that they were supposed to exercise under the Constitution have been stripped from them by the people in demanding the right to select a President for themselves; and when they were deprived of the power to vote directly for President by the interposition of this absurd device of an electoral college, in the first place through the Congressional caucus and in the next place by the party nominating convention, they have deprived these electors of the semblance of power, and they now stand before the people as the instructed and elected and chosen delegates of a party; and no man so chosen would dare, having been chosen as the electoral candidate of a party, to violate his trust. If any elector at the last election, having been chosen as an elector for Mr. Cleveland or as an elector for Mr. Blaine, had ventured in the college of electors in his State when they assembled for choosing a President under the Constitution to vote for any other than the man that he was elected to support, he would have been an outlaw and an outcast upon the face of the earth.

For these, with many other reasons that might be brought forward, I am unalterably opposed to any further tinkering with this electoral business. The country has outgrown it. It is out-worn. It has been repudiated. It no longer has any significance or substance; and any attempt to patch it, to plaster over its deformities, by any means of props and supports to strengthen it, merely delays the action of the people upon this subject in the acceptance of some scheme that will enable them in the exercise of their great functions to decide who shall be President without the intervention of electoral colleges, and certify their imperial will to some competent and defined power that shall declare the result.

I said at the outset that in my judgment the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts had offered an amendment of so material and vital a nature as that which appears in the print before me justified further deliberation upon this subject, and if I understand the meaning of this amendment—and the Senator from Massachusetts assures me privately that I do not—I feel sure that had it been incorporated in the Electoral Commission bill and could have been made effective it would have resulted inevitably in giving the result of that election in favor of the Democratic candidate, because, if I recollect aright, out of the three electors in Oregon two of them were certified by the governor to have been elected by the Republicans and one, Cronin, I think was the name, was declared to have been chosen by the Democrats, and thereupon would have been committed to the fortunes of Mr. Tilden. I may be mistaken. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if that was not the condition at that time?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. That is correct. Certificates were given to two Republicans and one Democrat.

Mr. INGALLS. The certificate of the governor of Oregon was that two of those electors were chosen by the Republicans and one was chosen by the Democrats; and if there is no escape from the conclusion that under this amendment if adopted by the Senate and enacted into a law so far as a statute could have any effect on this subject at all in a similar case there would be no possibility on the part of the tribunal passing upon these matters to review that decision, then I should like to hear what the Senator from Massachusetts has to say by way of explanation; and if that is the result, if a principle so important as this upon the spur of the moment, without debate or consideration or consultation, is to be adopted by the Senate, pregnant with such momentous consequences, I am very sure that he will not feel that I have been wanting in any respect to him in moving to recommit this bill.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I propose to offer a few remarks upon the matter now before the Senate, but at this hour perhaps it would not be convenient to the Senate for me to proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from New York if he prefers to proceed to-night or to-morrow? It is now after 4 o'clock.

Mr. EVARTS. I can go on to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from New York will yield to me for one moment I will move an executive session, but I wish to say one word before moving it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield the floor?

Mr. EVARTS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say simply that the Senator from Kansas seems to labor under a misapprehension which has found a place in the press. I interpose my most absolute denial to his statement that the Presidential succession bill which lately passed contained any defect that was not brought to the attention of the committee or which would have affected the vote of any single Senator who voted for it. The difficulty which he calls attention to in that bill was thoroughly and carefully considered by the members of the committee. The Constitution provides that in case of death, removal, resignation, or inability of the President and Vice-President, then certain legislative power is conferred upon Congress. It confers no authority whatever in the letter of the Constitution to provide by legislation at all for the case of the death of a President and Vice-President elect who have not yet become public officers or taken the oath. If, however, that should in the judgment of anybody be supposed to be within the legislative power, by looking at what the Constitution is supposed to have meant rather than at its letter, then unquestionably the bill covers that case, not as the Senator supposes the case of dying after the election and before the 4th of March, because if after election and before the ascertainment of the result here on the second Wednesday of February the two persons die, we find that no living person has been elected and the House of Representatives would proceed to exercise its constitutional functions. But it is true that if between the middle of February and the 4th of March the President and Vice-President elect both die, which would not be likely to happen once in five thousand years, because it is a time when of course great precautions would be taken; they would not be at the same place except at the moment of inauguration—I say if that remote and almost impossible contingency should happen within that fortnight or three weeks, it is true that the old Secretary of State would hold over under this bill to the end of the next four years. But that would not defeat the purpose of the bill, which is that the principal representative of the prevalent political opinion which had prevailed in the election should succeed and hold the office, except in those cases where in the previous election there had been a change in the politics of the country.

Mr. INGALLS. That sometimes happens.

Mr. HOAR. That has only happened eight times out of our twenty-four Presidential elections so far.

Mr. INGALLS. We hope it will happen next time.

Mr. HOAR. It would have made no difference at the second election of the first President, who held for eight years. It would have made no difference when Adams succeeded Washington. It would have made no difference when Madison succeeded Jefferson; when Monroe succeeded Madison; when Adams succeeded Monroe; when Van Buren succeeded Jackson, or when Buchanan succeeded Pierce. So the criticism which the Senator makes, and which was thoroughly considered by several Senators upon the committee, merely is that in relieving the legislation of the Government from this monstrosity which had prevailed, the possibility of imposing the Presidential office on an officer who all the time has to be presiding in the Senate or the House, and in providing this new and vast security for the life of the President of the United States which is to attend him through the whole four years, we were prevented by a difficulty absolutely insuperable from providing for a possible contingency which may happen within the space of ten days, but which will not happen once in ten thousand years. That is the whole of that criticism.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I supported the bill to which reference has been made believing it to be just in that it retained as far as possible in the hands of the party to whom the people had confided power executive functions during the constitutional term for which the President was elected; and I thought it was wise also because to that extent it removed the danger of a disputed Presidential succession, which is always so fatal to the repose and peace of this country. But still I think the criticism that I made is justified by the observations the Senator has just made. He admits that between the middle of February and the 4th of March in case of the exigency or emergency occurring which has been defined the result follows, the outgoing Secretary of State would exercise executive functions for the ensuing four years. He justifies the bill by saying that the period is so brief, the interim is so short that probably it never will occur; but the fatalities of the past twenty years have familiarized the public mind with the dangers that attend this subject. The people of this country are no longer prepared to disregard death as a factor in the great dramas of political supremacy in this country, and I therefore think that in leaving this crevice, this fissure, there has been a fatal defect in the bill. It is like the little pin that bores through the castle wall, and then farewell king. Of course if a President does not die and if a Vice-President does not die, then there will be no difficulty; but inasmuch as Presidents and Vice-Presidents are mortal, and as no one can tell when fatalities may occur, the difficulty to which I have referred is one that exists, and to that extent justifies the observations that I have made.

Mr. HOAR. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 1, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 25th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of a proposed amendment to the first section of the act ratifying an agreement with the Crow Indians in Montana, approved March 11, 1882, requested by said Indians for the purpose of increasing the amount of the annual payments under said agreement and reducing the number thereof, in order that sufficient means may be provided for establishing them on their individual allotments. The matter is presented for the consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 28, 1886.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SMALLS, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, for four days.

To Mr. IKE H. TAYLOR, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. CABELL, of West Virginia, for four days from Tuesday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, for this day, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. PETTIBONE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Frank A. Page, there being no adverse report thereon.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HANBACK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and ask that the paper I send to the desk be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE TELEPHONE SCANDAL.

The Hartford Times does not help the Democratic party by its plea in justification of the Pan-Electric Telephone stock ownership, any more than it disturbs The World by attributing its exposure and condemnation of the unfortunate business to a desire to create a sensation.

No plainer or more regrettable duty has ever been imposed upon The World than that of censuring the Attorney-General and other public men—in whose honor and integrity we have had the utmost confidence—for their association with this enterprise.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. My point is that this matter the Clerk is reading does not raise a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not yet know the contents of the paper. It may be that it contains some reflection upon the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] in his representative capacity. If so, it would be a proper basis for a question of privilege.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. But, Mr. Speaker, ought not the gentleman first to state his question of privilege before he introduces a paper to be read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that the gentleman desires to have this paper read as the basis of his remarks. As soon as the paper is read or its substance stated the Chair can tell whether it involves a question of privilege or not.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. But I insist, Mr. Speaker, upon my point of order, that the gentleman must first state his question of privilege. He has not stated it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the practice has been for a gentleman who rises to a question of privilege and asks to have a paper read to at least state that there is something in the paper which involves a question of that character. The Chair does not yet know what is contained in the paper which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] has sent to the desk.

Mr. HANBACK. Mr. Speaker, am I entitled to have my question of privilege presented to the House now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] to state whether or not there is anything in this paper which in his judgment involves a question of personal privilege on the part of that gentleman. Unless that were the rule, any gentleman might rise to a question of privilege and have anything that he chose read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HANBACK. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I state that there is a question of privilege involved.

The SPEAKER. Then, as the Chair understands, there is an allusion in this paper to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK]?

Mr. HANBACK. Yes; the article——

Several MEMBERS. Louder.

Mr. HANBACK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas will state what his question of privilege is.

Mr. HANBACK. The House will understand what the question is after the articles are read.

The SPEAKER. But unless the article which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] has sent to the desk reflects in some way upon the gentleman himself in his representative capacity there can be no question of personal privilege involved, so far as the Chair can see.

Mr. HANBACK. Not at all; I disclaim that; but I ask that the article that I have sent up be read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] does not state that the article contains any allusion to himself.

The SPEAKER. The article, so far as read, does not appear to contain anything personal to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that the gentleman from Kansas rises to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] will state whether he rises to a question of personal privilege or not, and what the question is to which he does rise.

Mr. HANBACK. I state to the Speaker that the article which the Clerk has begun to read and other articles reflect upon this House, and upon that ground, as one of the members of this body, entitled to the highest privilege, I ask that the article be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas states that this article, as he understands it, reflects upon the House of Representatives itself, and he raises this question not as a matter of personal privilege, but as a matter involving the privileges of the House.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, on this question I desire to make a suggestion to the Chair. It seems to me that the time has come when the Chair should consider whether the rule in question ought not to be more rigidly enforced. As I understand it the rule of law in analogous cases is, that when the question of the admissibility of a paper is raised the paper is submitted to the judge, and he decides, from an inspection itself, whether it be admissible or not. In that manner counsel are prevented from getting before the jury any improper matter.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Where is the jury here?

Mr. HERBERT. This is the jury—or rather the country is the jury before which the gentleman from Kansas desires——

Mr. REED, of Maine. Then your object is to prevent this from getting to the country.

Mr. HERBERT. The country is the jury before which the gentleman desires to get this matter presented in an improper manner.

Now, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the proper course would be, when a writing is sent up to be read, for the Speaker himself to read it. He is to judge in the first instance. If there be an appeal from his decision, then, as a matter of course, the House ought to have the document before it. But until there is an appeal from the decision of the Speaker, he and he alone should decide whether the writing or document presented raises a question of privilege or not.

If upon inspection it appears clearly to the Speaker that there is nothing in the article that constitutes matter of privilege, then the Speaker should so rule. From the paper itself this proposition must appear. If there is nothing in the paper itself to show it matter of privilege, no ingenuity can torture it into such. So I submit that the Speaker of this House ought to judge before the article is read, and without allowing it to go into the RECORD, whether or not there is a question of personal privilege presented.

Mr. DUNN. If the Speaker will allow me I would like to make one suggestion in the same line as that of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] and in addition to what he has so well said. I submit that the rule on this subject should be interpreted like the rule of law in pleading fraud. It is not sufficient that a pleader shall allege that there was fraud; he must state the facts constituting the fraud or exhibit them prima facie. It is not sufficient that a member of this House shall merely state that he rises to a question of privilege, he must state facts which constitute a question of personal privilege or of privilege of the House.

Now, the gentleman from Kansas has merely stated that he rises to a question of privilege; that the matter which he sends up to be read affects the privileges of this House; but he does not state facts nor show facts in that paper which constitute a question of personal privilege or privilege of the House; and until he states that or exhibits it to the Speaker he is out of order. He certainly is not on a mere declaration entitled to make the record of this House the vehicle to spread baseless scandal before the country.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty in regard to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] is that if the Chair simply takes the paper and reads it privately for his own information and then decides whether there is or is not a question of privilege involved, no member on the floor could know whether it was proper to take an appeal from the decision or not. The House must decide finally upon every question of order; so that the first thing to be done is to have the paper read, provided it is presented in a proper way. When a gentleman rises upon the floor and states that there is a question of personal privilege involved in a matter which he presents, it has not been the practice of the House to require him to make in the first instance any motion or offer any resolution.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the Chair allow me to suggest——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to complete his statement. But when a member states that he rises to a question involving the privileges of the House, then there must be some question presented. The Chair thinks the gentleman must make a motion or offer a resolution; and upon that the question of privilege will arise. Thus far the gentleman from Kansas has offered no resolution nor made any motion which would constitute the foundation for a question of privilege before the House.

Mr. HANBACK. I offer a resolution——

Mr. REAGAN. I submit, Mr. Speaker, it is important that the House should have some protection against the introduction of any kind of irrelevant matter under the guise of a "question of privilege."

The SPEAKER. Although the Chair has constantly endeavored to confine these questions of privilege as strictly as possible under the rules, still it is very difficult for the Chair in administering the rules to prevent gentlemen from sometimes making upon the floor statements which are not strictly within the rules. But the Chair will endeavor to administer the rule as fairly as it can be done.

Mr. REAGAN. We have as a matter of such frequent occurrence the abuse of the privilege that it seems to me the Committee on Rules should report some rule which would expose to the censure of the House members making this pretense falsely.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. HANBACK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. There is no question before the House until the resolution has been reported.

Mr. HANBACK. I desire to say that I do not seek to trifle with the House or violate any of its rules. I am standing here as a member of the House upon a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures——

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a question of order. I desire to invite the attention of the Speaker to the fact that in my judgment the gentleman from Kansas has not stated specifically upon his responsibility as a member of the House what the rule requires he should state. In other words, the rule requires he should state, and the statement must be made upon his honor and his responsibility as a Representative in this House, that this is a question of privilege and affects the "safety and dignity" of the House or the "integrity of its proceeding," or that it affects "the rights, reputation, and conduct of members individually in their representative capacity only."

I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Kansas has not up to this time stated upon his honor as a Representative that there is involved in this paper which he has sent up or in the resolution he proposes to submit any question affecting the integrity or character of this body, or any member of it in his representative capacity.

Mr. HANBACK. After the article which I present has been read, the gentleman himself will admit that it reflects upon the integrity of this body.

Mr. ROGERS. In its representative capacity?

Mr. HANBACK. In its representative capacity.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But in order to entitle the gentleman to have the article read, he must make a statement conforming to the rule just read by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], and until he has made that precedent statement he can not have anything read here, except by consent, as a matter of privilege.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Kansas does state that in his judgment there is a matter involved which affects the dignity and honor of the House; not of an individual member of the House, but the House of Representatives itself. That is all the Chair thinks any gentleman can state to entitle him to the floor on a question of privilege. But it may be that when the matter is fully disclosed it will appear that no question of privilege is involved.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Kansas spoke so indistinctly that I was unable to hear exactly what he did say. The statement, however, which the Chair makes, as being the point raised by the gentleman from Kansas, of course presents a different question.

The SPEAKER. After the resolution has been read it will then be the duty of the Chair to decide whether or not there is such a question of privilege involved as would give the gentleman the right to the floor.

The Clerk will read the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be, and is hereby, empowered to make full inquiry into any expenditure upon the part of the Government relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies; and for the purpose of this investigation and to the end that the people may be fully advised, the committee is granted the right to send for persons and papers, all expenses to be audited and accounted for upon approved vouchers, and when so approved to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly clear that that does not present a question affecting the dignity and honor of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kansas as to whether or not the resolution he has submitted involves a question of privilege. It seems to the Chair to be an ordinary resolution providing for an investigation and nothing more.

Mr. HANBACK. I desire to have read in this connection the articles which form a part of the statement upon which the question of privilege is based, and I now ask for their reading.

Mr. STRUBLE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STRUBLE. There is so much disorder upon the floor of the House that it is utterly impossible to distinguish what is going on. The gentleman from Kansas is usually able to make us hear him with a great deal of distinctness, but at the present it is not possible, at this distance, in the confusion prevailing, to hear a word.

The SPEAKER. The point of order the gentleman makes is well founded. The Chair will request the Sergeant-at-Arms to see that gentlemen are seated, and public business will be suspended until order is restored upon the floor

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. My point of order is that the Chair has already stated that the resolution which has been read from the Clerk's desk does not involve a question of privilege, and I therefore demand the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not believe that this House has anything to do with the subject-matter as presented in that resolution; and yet I am opposed to throwing any obstacle in the way of the fullest investigation of any matter which pertains to good government in the United States.

The SPEAKER. That is a question, of course, for the House to determine and not for the Chair. The Chair is called upon simply to decide the question raised as to whether or not this proposition of the gentleman from Kansas presents a question of privilege. While this may be a very proper subject of investigation, the Chair does not see that it involves any question of privilege.

Mr. HANBACK. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for what he has said, and if my question of privilege is permitted to be entertained by this House, the House will see that it is pertinent and that it is really a question of privilege. I ask, therefore, that the communications which I have sent up to the desk shall be now read as a part of my question of privilege.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. The Chair having decided that the resolution submitted was not in order, and did not present a question of privilege, I ask if the gentleman from Kansas has the right to the floor in any other way than by overruling the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Kansas, so far as he could understand what the gentleman was saying, to be making an appeal to the House to let the resolution pass. The Chair will state that during the last session of Congress the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] offered a resolution of a similar character to this, to investigate the conduct of a judge with a view ultimately to his impeachment. That resolution, it was claimed by the gentleman from Illinois, involved a question of privilege, but the Chair decided that it did not. The Chair is unable to see any difference between that resolution and the one now presented. They are simply resolutions proposing an investigation of matters which may or may not be proper for the House to investigate, but which do not involve questions of privilege under the rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to have the ruling of the Chair on that occasion read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] proceeds, the Chair would like to call his attention to a point which he conceives to be involved in this question. If a member on the floor should prefer articles of impeachment against a public officer, the Chair has no doubt that it would be a privileged matter under the Constitution, because this House possesses the power of impeachment. But this is not a resolution proposing to impeach any one; it simply instructs the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the truth or falsity of certain charges made against a public officer in a memorial which has been presented. The inquiry may result in an impeachment or it may not; but the doubt which the Chair has arises upon the distinction between a mere proposition to investigate charges against a public officer and a proposition to impeach that officer.

Mr. BEACH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEACH. Is the introduction of this resolution now in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that it is not.

Mr. BEACH. Then I demand the regular order.

Mr. HANBACK. I rise to a question of privilege, and I believe I have the floor for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. HANBACK. I am proceeding to submit the question of privilege, and I will now proceed with the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair has decided that the resolution which the gentleman has submitted does not involve a question of privilege under the rules of the House.

Mr. HANBACK. But, Mr. Speaker, how can that be before I am heard on my question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, as the Chair understands, now proposes to state a question of personal privilege. Is that what he proposes? If so, he will proceed to state it. The Chair has already decided on one alleged question of privilege.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas states he rises to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I would say to the gentleman from Kansas, if he really desires an investigation into any matter affecting the honor of this Government or the administration of the Department of Justice, I ask him not to attempt to bring it up out of its regular order, but that he introduce this matter in the order in which the Speaker indicates. If he does this I believe he will receive the unanimous concurrence of this side of the House in ordering a thorough and searching investigation. Let him adopt this course instead of trying to violate the rules and order of the House. If it is an investigation he wants, we will, I think, unanimously aid him in having a full investigation according to the rules of parliamentary law. And I suggest to him that he can offer his resolution as soon as his State is called.

Mr. HANBACK. There is no gentleman on the other side of the House for whom I have a higher regard than for the gentleman who has just spoken. I state to him on my honor as a Representative in this House that the matters which I shall present attach themselves to every member in this House.

Mr. LONG. State your question.

Mr. HANBACK. It is a question of the highest privilege, because the honor of the House is assailed; and as a member of this House I desire to have my question of privilege presented to the House and the country, in order that all the facts may be ascertained.

Mr. LONG. Present it.

Mr. HANBACK. I was proceeding to state it when interrupted by gentlemen on the other side. I will read as part of my remarks on the question of privilege——

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Kansas has stated no question of privilege.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Allow him to state it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Kansas ought to state if there has been any reflection on him in his representative capacity as a member of the House. He ought at least to state that in his judgment there has been such a reflection; otherwise all kinds of irrelevant matters might be brought into the House and either read by the member or from the Clerk's desk and the House would have no protection against the interruption of the regular order of business. The Chair understood the gentleman from Kansas to say there was no reflection on him in his representative capacity in the article he sent to the Clerk's desk, but that it was a matter involving the privileges of the House itself. When the gentleman offered his resolution the Chair decided at once, in accordance with decisions hitherto made uniformly as the Chair thinks, that there was no question involving the privileges of the House. Now the Chair understands the gentleman to say he rises to a question of personal privilege. The Chair thinks he ought to state whether any reflection has been made on him in his representative capacity, and what that reflection is. In order to do this it may not be necessary to read a long newspaper article.

Mr. HANBACK. I was proceeding to state the question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. On the contrary, the gentleman has distinctly stated there was nothing in either of the articles that reflected on him in his representative capacity in any way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. HAMMOND. And therefore the gentleman is simply abusing the rules of the House.

Mr. HANBACK. I have always understood, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MORRISON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HANBACK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRISON. I have requested the gentleman from Kansas to yield to me to ask unanimous consent that he may present his resolution now. It is the same thing whether presented now or twenty minutes later.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] asks the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] to yield to him that he may ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's resolution may be considered. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. HANBACK. After I have stated my question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's question of personal privilege has no connection with the resolution. The Chair has decided the resolution involves no question of privilege. Thereupon the Chair understood the gentleman rose to a question of personal privilege which has no connection with the resolution.

Mr. HANBACK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, that his request may be submitted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution, after which the Chair will ask for objections, if any.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be, and it is hereby, empowered to make inquiry into any expenditure upon the part of the Government relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone companies, and for the purpose of this investigation and to the end that the people may be fully advised, the committee is granted the right to send for persons and papers, all expenses to be audited and accounted for upon approved vouchers, and when so approved to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to its consideration at this time. I am willing to let it come in for reference, but if it is going to give rise to debate I must object.

Mr. MORRISON and Mr. ROGERS. No, no!

Several MEMBERS on the Democratic side. Let it be passed; let it be passed.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered; and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] will state distinctly, so that the Chair and House can understand what his question of personal privilege is, it will save time.

Mr. HANBACK. I will attempt, Mr. Speaker, to explain my question of privilege. I am a Representative of one of the States of this Union upon this floor, elected and duly accredited as a member of this House, and when two of the great journals of this country present, upon their editorial pages, a charge——

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] has stated no question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is proceeding to state his question, as the Chair understands.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] is proceeding to speak on the editorials of certain newspapers, having previously announced that they make no allusion to him and none to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no means of knowing that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] is now alluding to the same paper of which he spoke a while ago. The gentleman speaks now of two editorials.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then, Mr. Speaker, the rule requires that the gentleman should state to the Chair that he is now alluding to new matter.

The SPEAKER. There is no rule prescribing what the gentleman shall state to the Chair. The Chair has notified the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] that he ought to state to the Chair and to the House what his question of privilege is; and, as the Chair understands, the gentleman is proceeding to do that.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then, Mr. Speaker, I submit that until the gentleman does make such a declaration he has no right to be heard at all.

The SPEAKER. But if the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] is interrupted by a point of order before he has an opportunity to make any statement, the Chair must be at a loss to determine the question. The Chair will hear what the gentleman has to say, and will endeavor to confine him within the rules.

Mr. HANBACK. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] will keep quiet a moment I will endeavor to state my question of privilege. I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, that after two great journals of this country have spread upon their editorial pages a charge against members of this House, I, as one Representative upon this floor, claim the right to be heard in the matter. It is a charge against every gentleman in this House, and I was proceeding, in behalf of my question of privilege——

The SPEAKER. But the Chair thinks that does not involve any matter of personal privilege of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK], and unless the gentleman, either by name or in some other way, is alluded to, or some reflection is made upon him, there is no basis for a question of personal privilege.

Mr. HANBACK. The charge is that members in this House have been corruptly influenced in their action.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. My point is that any one who charges corruption vaguely upon members of this House can in no wise be considered as reflecting personally upon the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK], and I am surprised that he should appropriate such remarks to himself. [Laughter]. This is not a question of personal privilege, and I insist that the gentleman is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] makes any statement from which it appears that there has been any reflection upon him individually in his representative capacity.

Mr. HANBACK. No.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman to say even that there is anything in these articles referring to the present House of Representatives.

Mr. HANBACK. To the present House. I have the charges.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] state briefly what the charge is?

Mr. HANBACK. I can state it better, if the Chair will permit me, by reading.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman can not proceed unless he states what his question is or what the charge is. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The Chair decides that the matter presented by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] does not raise a question of privilege. This being Monday, the regular order is——

Mr. HANBACK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided the question raised by the gentleman from Kansas. If the gentleman desires to appeal——

Mr. HANBACK. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. HANBACK. I rise now to a parliamentary inquiry. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HANBACK. When a member upon this floor rises to a question of personal privilege, I ask the Chair, has he not a right to state what it is?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HANBACK. I was proceeding to state it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had stated that the articles to which he alluded contained no personal reflection upon him, but that, as he understood them, they reflected upon the House. That is not a question of personal privilege affecting the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK]. That is a matter which involves the dignity and honor of the House itself, and can only be raised when there is a motion or resolution which presents some question for the House. [Renewed cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HANBACK. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, and others. Regular order!

Mr. HANBACK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HANBACK. I am proceeding to do so.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a point of order. I submit that after the decision of the Chair the gentleman has no remedy except by an appeal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so holds, and has asked the gentleman from Kansas whether or not he desires to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HANBACK. After I am through with my inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his inquiry.

Mr. HANBACK. My inquiry is this, When a matter is charged against the House, have I not the right to rise to a question of personal privilege?

The SPEAKER. Not to a question of personal privilege. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has stated that he himself is not affected personally by this matter. It seems to me we need not waste any more time in that direction.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Chair has decided the gentleman's question of order. If he desires to take an appeal the Chair will put that question to the House. If not, the Chair will proceed with the regular business of the House. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BRADY. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRADY. I have been reflected upon as a member of this House, not only in the public journals, but according to the reports in the public press before a committee of this House. I have also been reflected upon on the floor of the House; and I now rise to ask unanimous consent that I may be accorded the privilege of a personal explanation. [Cries of "Object!" and "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY] asks unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BRADY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRADY. I desire to know whether or not I have a right to make a request for a personal explanation as a matter of privilege.

The SPEAKER. Any reflection upon the gentleman in his representative capacity would involve a question of privilege. The Chair will cause to be read the rule on this subject—a rule which seems to be somewhat misunderstood. A "personal explanation" is one thing, and a "question of privilege" is another and quite a different thing.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE IX.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of members individually in their representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will see from what has just been read what matters constitute under the rules questions of privilege.

Mr. BRADY. I desire to state to the House again that I have been misrepresented through the public press and before a committee of this House and upon this floor, and I ask——

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BRADY. I ask for unanimous consent to vindicate myself as a member of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] will state his question of order.

Mr. HAMMOND. And the gentleman from Virginia should not undertake to proceed until I have stated it. My point of order is that the gentleman has stated no matter of privilege and therefore is not entitled to the floor.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman asks unanimous consent.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then I object.

Mr. BRADY. I understand the other side to object when a member has been assailed unjustly——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. KELLEY. On the last day when I was able to be on the floor I presented a bill which the then temporary occupant of the chair held, in opposition to my views, should go, not as I suggested, to the Committee of Ways and Means, but to the Committee on Claims, in which ruling he seemed to be justified by the title of the bill, which is "A bill for the relief of R. C. Ridgway and others." It is, however, a matter that has been before the Committee of Ways and Means. The proofs are all before that committee. The first favorable report on the subject was made by the present occupant of the Speaker's chair, the second by the gentleman who now addresses him, and the third by my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT]; and in these various operations the bill, which had been presented as a bill for the relief of certain individuals, became by a substitute a general measure, regulating the readjustment of taxes improperly collected. That is the bill; and it therefore belongs explicitly to the Committee of Ways and Means. I ask that the bill (H. R. 1980), incorrectly entitled "A bill for the relief of R. C. Ridgway and others," be transferred from the Committee of Claims to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BLOUNT. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to state that this is a general provision of law?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have some recollection of it.

Mr. KELLEY. The substitute prepared by the Committee of Ways and Means, after consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury and two successive Commissioners of Internal Revenue, was a general provision of law.

Mr. BLOUNT. What I want to know from the gentleman from Pennsylvania is whether it is the substitute he now wants to have referred.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; that is what I want to send to the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. I had an idea it was an individual claim.

Mr. KELLEY. No; the title stands as it did, but the substitute is a new measure.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us hear the bill read.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania send up the bill?

Mr. KELLEY. I have it not at hand. It is bill H. R. 1980. I can send up the reports which have been made. I read from one of the reports:

The committee report a substitute for the bill, conforming essentially to the suggestion of the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who will be authorized to refund amounts as shall be shown to his satisfaction to have been paid as taxes on distilled spirits in excess of the tax due on the actual quantity withdrawn from warehouse.

The substitute is the bill I present. It is a general measure, touching matters pertaining under the rules to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the bill to be read for the information of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to correct the reference——

Mr. RANDALL. Not to correct, but to give a different reference.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this bill is a very long one, and seems to contain provisions for the payment of claims to a number of different persons.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to have it read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know if this is the substitute referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that this is a substitute, which was reported by the Committee on Ways and Means of the last Congress.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. But the rules have been changed since then.

Mr. BLOUNT. It seems as if this is not a general bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the reference?

Mr. BLOUNT. I must object, or we must abandon the rule entirely.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. BLAND submitted a resolution, which was read, as follows:

Whereas, at the convention of the American Bankers' Association, held at Chicago, Ill., in the month of September, 1885, Mr. George S. Coe, a member of the executive council of said association, and the president of the American Exchange National Bank of New York City, made, in an address delivered before said convention, the following statements, viz:

"Under these peculiar circumstances [referring to assumed dangers resulting from the continued coinage of silver] the new government came into power. It was at once confronted by the peculiar difficulties surrounding the Treasury Department. Like his predecessor, the President clearly appreciated the magnitude and imminence of the danger, and in the interim before the meeting of Congress he is taking as efficient steps as are practicable under the existing law to save the nation from being precipitated into the deep abyss of financial deterioration.

"His temporary expedient is both simple and safe. The law requires the Treasurer to purchase not less than $2,000,000 worth of silver bullion per month and coin it into dollars. But he is required to pay them out only when necessary.

"To avoid this necessity the Treasurer now confines his disbursements to strictly legal demands and refrains from monthly payments as hitherto of the funded debt.

"The surplus of revenue supplies requisite means not only to purchase the monthly sum of silver bullion required by law, but also to withdraw a sufficient amount of silver certificates issued upon previous purchases to overcome the excessive accumulations which so perplexed the prior administration.

"This will safely hold the situation until Congress shall convene.

"The temporary danger which existed until income thus overtook expenditures was satisfactorily arranged by concert with the clearing-house committee in New York, whose earnest efforts at that critical moment to preserve the gold standard were enlisted in behalf of the commercial community, which it is their function to specially represent." (Page 35 of published record of the proceedings of said convention.)

And whereas, near the close of the second session Forty-eighth Congress, to wit, on the 26th day of February, 1885, this House refused, by a decided vote, to consider a then pending proposition looking to suspension of the coinage of silver dollars: Therefore,

Be it resolved by this House, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House whether or not any such agreement or arrangement was effected by the management of the Treasury Department with the clearing-house committee in New York, or with any other association or person, as is alleged in the said address of Mr. Coe; and, if so, by what authority of law the Treasury Department assumed to virtually suspend the coinage of silver by hoarding the money in the Treasury after it is coined.

And, further, to inform this House what amount of silver dollars was in the Treasury on the 4th day of March last unrepresented by outstanding certificates, and what amount of silver certificates was in circulation; what amount of such dollars is now in the Treasury unrepresented by outstanding certificates, and what amount of such certificates is now in circulation.

Also, what amount of silver dollars was in the Treasury on the 4th day of March last that could have been applied in the payment of the interest-bearing debt and other dues of the Government, and what amount of such dollars is now held in the Treasury that could be so applied; also, what amount of silver certificates is held in the Treasury that could be reissued; also, what amount of interest-bearing debt is now subject to call, and what policy is to be pursued in the payment of silver thereon and on other public dues.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WELLBORN). This resolution will be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the reference of this resolution, it seems to me that, inasmuch as it relates entirely to currency and not to coinage, it should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I ask the Chair to consider the propriety of that reference.

Mr. MILLS. Let me ask my colleague on the committee if it does not also refer to the payment of the public debt?

Mr. HEWITT. It also refers to the payment of the public debt, but it deals entirely with existing coins already coined under the law, and has no reference to coinage whatever—no suspension, no change in reference to it. It only refers to a circulating medium, and that, under the rules, belongs to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, that refers to silver coin struck under the act of 1878. It refers to certificates issued upon that coin, a mere incident or representative of the coin, and therefore subject to the same provisions and regulations as the coin itself.

But, sir, pending before that committee are propositions to change the law of 1878. Several have reference to the suspension of coinage, others have reference to the limiting of coinage, and others to giving unlimited coinage. This matter is a proper subject of consideration by that committee with reference to this question of legislation; for, sir, if, under that law, there is no provision by which this money can get into circulation, it is the duty of that committee to so legislate upon the subject as to turn that money into circulation.

Mr. STEELE. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is not debatable. The Chair thinks the bill should go to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. It is a matter, however, which is under the control of the majority of the House, and, unless instructed to the contrary, the Chair will direct that reference.

Mr. MILLS. The Chair is unquestionably right in his ruling; it evidently belongs to the Committee on Coinage.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that bill be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill, it seems to the Chair, should go to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HEWITT. I am compelled to dissent from the opinion of the Chair. That was my own impression, but this is not a claim in any proper sense. The bill relates to the repayment of a portion of the old public debt. It is a very curious case, and the bill relates solely to the repayment of an old certificate of indebtedness of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the gentleman from New York thinks it is not a claim against the Government?

Mr. HEWITT. It is a claim against the Government in one sense and in one sense only. The claimant (if we may call her so) holds one of the old certificates of indebtedness of the United States, which is payable at the Treasury, and which the Secretary would pay but for the fact that the fund has been covered into the Treasury. I ask unanimous consent that the bill go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The matter is now in the control of the House. The Chair will entertain a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HEWITT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. The question of where the bill should go has been a matter of very careful consideration, and I am satisfied that it should go to that committee.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] to withdraw his motion for a moment in order that I may introduce a bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If I can have unanimous consent to stand with my motion where I am now I am willing to withdraw it temporarily for the introduction of bills.

The SPEAKER. That is something with which the Chair has nothing to do. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] asks unanimous consent as just stated by him.

Mr. MATSON. I object. I wish to introduce a resolution.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then I adhere to my motion.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, and the House refused to adjourn; only thirteen members voting in the affirmative.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is engaged in executing an order of the House to recognize members for the introduction of bills.

SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. BRUMM introduced a bill (H. R. 5176) to provide for further coinage of silver dollars; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

CURRENCY, ETC.

Mr. BRUMM also introduced a bill (H. R. 5177) to simplify the currency, strengthen the coin reserve, prevent contraction, and provide for a gradual increase of the circulating medium; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman introducing this bill proposes that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BLAND. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read in part, when

Mr. BLAND said: This is the bill I supposed it to be. It is a bill limited to coinage and repeals the present law authorizing the coinage of silver. The certificates to which the bill refers are a mere incident, a mere representative of coin; and certainly any question relating to them should be considered where the question of the coinage itself should be continued. The bill provides for deposits of bullion; it repeals the present coinage law; and if the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has jurisdiction of anything, it must have jurisdiction of this subject. A similar bill has already been sent to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty with regard to quite a number of bills introduced here is that they refer both to the currency and to coinage, so that it is sometimes almost impossible for the Chair to determine to which committee they most appropriately belong.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The SPEAKER. This bill relates to coinage, and also to the currency. The gentleman from Missouri moves to refer it to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The Chair thinks the character of the bill is such that the House ought to determine where it shall be sent.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, the principal object of this bill is to provide a paper circulation. There can scarcely be presented to this House any bill with reference to these subjects that does not involve both the question of coinage and the question of a paper circulation, but the principal object of this bill is a paper circulation, a circulation of United States Treasury notes. One of the minor questions presented in the bill has reference to the deposit of bullion in the Treasury and decreasing the coinage, but as the great purpose of the bill has relation to the paper circulation, it should go, I submit, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. The House will determine the matter. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to refer the bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 97, noes 55.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and was ordered to be printed.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS TO WIDOWS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be, and is hereby, discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 545, entitled "A bill to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors," and all pending amendments thereto, and that the same be passed with the following amendment:

"At the end of line 9, in the first section thereof, insert the following: Provided, That this act shall apply only to widows who were married to the deceased soldier or sailor prior to its passage and to those who may hereafter marry prior to or during the service of the soldier or sailor."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. This bill was pending in the Committee of the Whole House as unfinished business. It stands now upon the Calendar in that attitude. There is or was, and will be when the House again resolves itself into a Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bill, a pending amendment proposing to repeal the limitations to the arrears-of-pension act. Now, if this resolution is put upon its passage, or, in other words, if the Committee of the Whole House is now discharged from the further consideration of the bill, does it bring the amendment with the bill in the House to be voted on?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The resolution proposes to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill and the pending amendments and pass the same with an amendment, which is specified in the resolution.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Leaving the other amendment where, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. MORRISON. Nowhere.

The SPEAKER. It disposes of the amendments, there being no bill in the committee to which they properly belong.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. They are gone then "where the woodbine twineth?"

Another inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Will it be in order now, if the motion to suspend the rules is seconded, to demand a division of the question; in other words, to take the question first on the motion to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration and then to pass it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The resolution embodies but one legislative proposition.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And must be voted as a whole?

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules suspends all rules and the one vote disposes of the proposition.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 88, noes 78.

Mr. MATSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 54 members voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 97, nays 172, not voting 54; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I ask that by unanimous consent the reading of the names be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL with Mr. HITT, for this day.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I desire to announce that my colleague Mr. WADE, who did not respond to the roll-call, is detained in his room by reason of sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BROWNE of Indiana. There is; but so far as I am concerned I do not care to ask for tellers, if the House by unanimous consent shall order a second.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in opposition to the resolution and fifteen minutes in support of it. The Chair will recognize to control the time in support of the resolution the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. MATSON, and he will recognize to control the time in opposition to it the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BROWNE.

Mr. MATSON. The effect of this resolution is to give this bill a chance to be considered upon its merits. That is the object and that is the effect of the resolution. An amendment has been proposed in the resolution providing that the provisions of the bill shall not apply to those who marry soldiers after the passage of the act. It applies, however, to every wife and every widow of a soldier at this time. The amendment was made with the view of meeting a very strong objection that was urged at the time that this bill was discussed in the Committee of the Whole. Now, Mr. Speaker, with this statement I reserve the remainder of my time till I have heard what is to be said in objection to the resolution.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I interposed an objection to the passage of this resolution, because, whether intended or not, it withdraws from the consideration of this House a very important question, one in which a very large and respectable part of the American people are interested. The attitude of this question is well understood by gentlemen of the House. This bill which my colleague proposes to pass now under this resolution is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House, and its consideration could not be possibly avoided in the nature of things. No resort to parliamentary tactics could long delay its discussion and a final vote on it by this House of Representatives.

While the bill was pending there I did as I had a right to do, and as I believe it to be my duty to do, offer an amendment to repeal what is known as the limitations to the arrears-of-pension act. I offered that as an amendment to the bill.

I supposed that the House was ready to consider this important question. Political parties have been posing in the presence of nearly two millions of men who went out to the battlefields of the Republic and have been promising them this measure; if there be any one promise that has been crystallized in political speeches and party platforms it has been this pledge to repeal the limitations of that act and to put all the wounded and disabled soldiers of this nation upon a platform of perfect equality. [Applause on the Republican side.] A very respectable political party resolved at its national convention to do this thing, and I might say but for the unfortunate alliteration of "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion" it might possibly have been in the ascendency in the Republic to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRISON. That is what did it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, since the introduction of that amendment we have been astounded by the report of the vast sum of money that is to be taken from the Treasury in the event it should become a part of the bill. The Commissioner of Pensions has made an estimate, putting the aggregate at some $302,000,000. I have not the time to discuss the accuracy of that estimate. I will only say, however, in passing, if it costs all that if spread over a period of ten years, which is the lowest period in which any one expects it to be paid, it would amount to less than 7 per cent. per annum of our aggregate revenues.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman from Indiana will allow me to make a single remark, I will say the letter itself of the Commissioner of Pensions shows that that estimate is $80,000,000 too much; for he adds, in order to make up the $302,000,000, the $80,000,000 now provided for by the act of January 25, 1879, and the act of March 3, 1879.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. This is not a new question. It has been confronting the American people for many years. I hold here the report of the late Commissioner of Pensions. As early as April, 1884, he made an estimate of the probable cost of this repeal, amounting, according to his showing, to about $250,000,000; and with that estimate before the people these political parties have been "resolving" that this thing should be done. With that estimate in view, the present Commissioner of Pensions, in his report made less than sixty days ago, uses this language:

The Commissioner respectfully calls attention to the widespread feeling that the limitation imposed by section 2 of the act of March 3, 1879, is unjust in its operation—

Mr. Speaker, this widespread feeling seems to extend more everywhere else than in this House. The Commissioner proceeds—

If a soldier was entitled to a pension at any time prior to the 1st of July, 1880, no good reason is known to exist why he should not now be allowed to make proof thereof and establish his title thereto under such restrictions and conditions as the wisdom of Congress may direct.

That, I think, is as near a recommendation of an unconditional repeal of this arrearage limitation as could be put in English. But that is not all. The gentleman talks about stripping this bill of everything extraneous. Well, if there were anything in this measure calculated to embarrass its passage I should not blame gentlemen who were in favor of it for insisting that it should not be so encumbered. I know that gentlemen used that argument on the floor not long since, but it struck me then as it does now, that if there were enough votes in this House to adopt the amendment then there were enough votes to pass the measure as amended. [Applause on the Republican side.] For I undertake to say, speaking for the ninety-eight men who voted here for adjournment, that they will probably vote for this bill as it is, and I know they would vote for it with that amendment attached to it. [Renewed applause.]

In addition to the statement to which I have referred, I hold in my hand the unanimous report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions made at the last session recommending the repeal of this limitation. Here it is. I admit that four gentlemen belonging to that committee qualify their approval of the measure, but they qualify it in this way:

We heartily concur in the general proposition that it is not right to pay any soldier or his dependents a pension from the date of his discharge or the date of his disability and another from a later date, and therefore join in the majority report.

If it was not right, Mr. Speaker, that this limitation should be made by law, what is there wrong in the proposition for repeal upon which gentlemen in this House are asked to vote? These members of the committee go on to say: "But we suggest that a bill extending the benefit of the arrears to all who have applied up to this time will meet the emergency."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was said the other day, and the RECORD will bear me out in the statement——

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Wait a moment.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman is now speaking against this bill and we are cut off from reply. I merely wish to ask him why he did not bring in a bill himself four years ago as chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If I am subject to censure for having failed to perform my duty let the gentleman make the point. I am talking about what is in front of me now. I have not time to respond to the gentleman. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIS. It would take a long time to respond to that.

A MEMBER on the Republican side. Let us pass it now.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I wish I could be permitted to make my speech.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] is not subject to interruption without his consent.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I was attempting to say, Mr. Speaker, that we were informed the other day that gentlemen were opposed to the consideration of the amendment because it was to be brought in, I suppose by a report of some committee having charge of the subject-matter, as a separate proposition, and that then the House would have an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon that measure untrammeled by the consideration of anything else. I ask if there is any gentleman in this House this afternoon who is prepared to say to me that any committee of this House will ever report such a measure and permit the people's representatives to vote upon it? Is there any gentleman here this afternoon who dare tell me that that measure has not gone to the congressional cemetery—that it is not to die in the pigeonhole? I pause for a reply.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No, sir; I am asking questions now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] declines to be interrupted.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I was proceeding to say, Mr. Speaker, that whatever might have been the prospect then, that hope is utterly dissipated now. The country knows—it is not a secret, it is in the public prints, it is on the tongue of every gentleman who discusses the question—that we have heard the last of the arrearage repeal when this bill is passed, when it is taken off the Calendar and out of the Committeee of the Whole, where if it had remained we could have compelled gentlemen to vote one way or the other.

I should not have embarrassed the passage of this measure in any degree if I had not believed from the beginning that it was the only opportunity we would ever have of getting a vote of this House on this important question. I state to the House this afternoon—and I am willing to put my reputation as a prophet on it—that never again will this House have an opportunity of voting directly or indirectly on this question, unless by the courtesy of the Speaker I may be recognized on some day to put the measure through under a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I stated a while ago that this resolution has one purpose and object, to enable this House to consider the merits of this bill alone. My friend from Indiana has from the beginning, before the general debate had ended last week, indicated his exceeding haste to put himself in the attitude of placing this amendment on the bill. He stated then, and he says now, that he did this because he feared the House would not have an opportunity to vote upon this proposition in which he is so much interested. He wants to know if there is any one here who is able to say that this House will have an opportunity to vote upon it; that any committee will report such a bill as he asks shall be passed by the House in relation to the arrears question. He knows very well that it is impossible for any member to say what the action of any committee is to be upon any particular proposition. He knows very well that I can not say——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he did not state the other day that his committee intended to report such a bill.

Mr. MATSON. I did not understand the gentleman's question. I will answer if he will repeat it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask the gentleman whether he was not understood on a former occasion, when this matter was discussed, to give an assurance that his committee would report such a bill.

Mr. MATSON. I was understood to say that that was my opinion, and that is my opinion now. That is what I was proposing to say to my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]—that the Committee on Invalid Pensions will, in my opinion, at an early day report upon this proposition and upon other propositions equally important in the interest of the soldiers of the country.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MATSON. I will.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman state to the House whether or not the Committee on Invalid Pensions has already considered this matter and directed any report to be made?

Mr. MATSON. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has been considering this matter carefully. Some facts, alluded to by the gentleman from Indiana, have been stated which have caused the committee to inquire carefully into this subject before deciding upon their action. Does anybody blame them for that? Let my friend from Indiana remember the Committee on Invalid Pensions has been organized less than a month, and he, the chairman of this committee in the Forty-seventh Congress, who during two full sessions never reported a single bill to relieve the soldiers of the country in the way of general legislation [applause on the Democratic side], now attempts to upbraid the Committee on Invalid Pensions, though within less than ten days after its organization it reported this bill which was so much demanded not only by the soldiers of the country but by the sentiment of the whole people—a bill to relieve the widows of the private soldiers.

Let me ask the members of this House what measure relating to the interests of the soldiers should have preference in consideration? Is it that measure which proposes to give large sums to a few individuals, or is it that measure which proposes to relieve the pressing necessities of the widows of the country? Which measure is it that ought to have preference, and which measure do you by your votes to-day propose to maintain as entitled to preference? Will you say by voting against this bill that you want to give preference to those who are asking for arrears? Why, there are other classes of soldiers who in my judgment ought to be preferred. They are those who are now in the poor-house. There ought to be some measure of relief passed by this Congress by which these men, who, by reason of some technicality, are unable to make the proof necessary to entitle them to a pension would be enabled to get a pension which would take them out of the poor-house. Ought not such a measure to be preferred? Does not my friend from Indiana admit that proposition, or does he insist that of all the measures—and they are numerous—of all the measures relating to pensions, does he insist that the particular measure he advocates must be preferred?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the gentleman desires an answer, I will give it to him.

Mr. MATSON. Never mind now. The gentleman himself refused to yield.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am in favor of providing for all of them.

Mr. MATSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to read an extract from a letter written by the treasurer of an organization called the United States Maimed Soldiers' League; and I think it reflects the opinion and sentiment not only of the gallant men who lost their legs and their arms upon the field of battle, but also of the great mass of the soldiers of this country. Let us see what this gentleman said in his representative capacity. On the 26th of January, 1886, addressing a letter to me, he says:

> The soldiers thank you for standing so steadily by the widows, orphans, and dependent parents bill, permitting no amendments to it. We do not want any favors, no matter how important, tacked on to such a worthy bill.

That I believe to be the real sentiment of the soldiers of this country.

I know, as my friend from Indiana says, that there is a clamor for the passage of this repeal of the limitation clause on the arrearages act. Of course there is, and so there is with reference to a dozen other different propositions which might be claimed should be tacked on to this bill. But he knows that we can not pass them all; and I know, and he knows also, that if his amendment is tacked on, if this House shall adopt it, then comes in a long train of other irrelevant propositions which ought not to be put upon this bill, all of them tending to its defeat.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Then why did you amend it yourself?

Mr. MATSON. Because I saw that it would help the bill. It amends the original proposition and is not a new one. [Derisive cries on the Republican side.]

Mr. REED, of Maine. Was not the very amendment which you say would help the bill voted down by this House?

Mr. MATSON. I voted for it myself, and I say to the gentleman from Maine in reply to his question that whenever I see that a man has an idea which is better than my own I am not going to refuse to adopt it. I believed that an objection, and a strong objection, to the bill would thus be obviated; and I therefore propose an amendment which is embodied in this resolution. I have no concealments to make about it. I am trying to do the very best I know how to do for the soldiers of the country. I know very well, gentlemen, that when you once begin to pile on these amendments to this bill it means a concentration of all the opposition to each of these measures, and that is the end of all legislation.

And so the case stands to-day; and the question is a simple one, outside of the proposition that every matter of legislation ought to be allowed to stand upon its own individual merits. The question here right now is: Are you willing to put this bill upon its merits, and are you willing for every other proposition, including that of the gentleman from Indiana, to stand upon its own merits? That is the whole question, and I submit it to the House with every confidence that it will meet the approval of the House and of the people whose interests we are here to represent.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana; Mr. REED, of Maine, and others demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STRUBLE. I call for the reading of the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 198, nays 66, not voting 59; as follows:

The Clerk proceeded to read the names.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I withdraw the demand for the reading.

Mr. DOCKERY. I insist upon the reading.

The Clerk then recapitulated the names of those voting.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. WARD, of Indiana, with Mr. ROGERS, on this vote. If present, Mr. WARD would vote "ay," Mr. ROGERS "no."

Mr. DUNN with Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, for the rest of the day.

Mr. DAWSON with Mr. BURNES, on this question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, with Mr. CALDWELL, on this vote.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I desire to ask the Chair for my personal information if the resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] now under consideration is on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. If that resolution is adopted the bill is passed.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I did not so understand it, and desire to say that I have voted in the negative, but under no circumstances would I vote against the soldier or the soldier's widow, and therefore change my vote from the negative to the affirmative.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent to vote on this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat when the roll was called?

Mr. BARKSDALE. I was not in my seat when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not, under the rule, entertain the request of the gentleman.

Mr. BARKSDALE. If I had been present I should have voted "no" on this resolution.

Mr. LAWLER. I want to say that on this morning a delegation of letter-carriers having come to the city here, we adjourned the meeting until 4 o'clock this afternoon. I was unavoidably absent down there explaining to these people that this vote was to be taken, and I want to vote on this question, and vote in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman was not in his seat when his name was called the Chair can not entertain the request that he be allowed to cast his vote now.

Mr. LAWLER. If I had been present I should have voted "ay."

Mr. EDEN. My colleague Mr. TOWNSHEND is absent by leave of the House; if present, he would have voted "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRISON (at 4 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 2, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of January 19, 1886, the annual report of Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, on river improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The attention of the Senators from Oregon is called to the communication.

Mr. DOLPH. It is in response to a resolution submitted by my colleague [Mr. MITCHELL]. I presume that the Committee on Commerce would be the proper reference.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I ask that the accompanying papers be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion must be referred to the Committee on Printing under the rule.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Then I move that the communication and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HALE presented resolutions adopted by the Portland (Maine) Typographical Union, remonstrating against certain changes proposed in regard to the international copyright law; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, presented a petition of Corbett & Maclay and other canners, merchants, and exporters, of Portland, Oreg., praying for the enactment of a law for the return in full of duties paid on imported material when articles are manufactured and exported; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRYE. I have a paper addressed to me, but really it is a petition to the Senate, from the Knights of Labor of Auburn, Me., praying for the organization of a Territorial form of Government over the Indian Territory, &c. I presented a petition of the same character yesterday, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. It seems to me that such petitions ought to go to the Committee on Territories, it being a question of the organization of a proposed Territory, that of Oklahoma.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such petitions have always been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to that reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FRYE. I present another of the same nature from the Dirigo Local Assembly of Knights of Labor of Maine, making the same prayer. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented a petition of citizens of Lewes, Del., praying an appropriation for the completion of the pier in Delaware Bay, near Lewes, in Sussex County, Delaware; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present sundry petitions, one from the Nevada Local Assembly, No. 3769, another from the Pierce City Local Assembly, No. 3144, another from the Warrensburg Local Assembly, No. 2139, and another from Rich Hill Local Assembly, No. 2017, of the Knights of Labor of the State of Missouri, requesting the organization of a Territorial form of government over the Indian Territory and the opening up of all the public and unoccupied lands in that Territory immediately to settlement under the homestead laws, and the allotment of the lands therein in severalty to the Indians upon their present reservations, and the purchase of the surplus lands of the reservations by the United States, and the opening up of the same to settlement hereafter, to the end that speculators shall cease their control and occupancy of the land and no injustice be done to the Indians, and that the laboring mechanic and homeless man may at once secure a home. I presume the petitions should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Did I understand the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] to say yesterday that the Committee on the Judiciary is considering the question of the extension of the laws of the United States over the Indian Territory?

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that a bill establishing a court in the Indian Territory was referred to the Judiciary Committee. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] can answer the question more definitely.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will let these petitions go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FRYE. All such petitions have been referred to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of the directors and members of the Merchants' Exchange of the city of Saint Louis, praying Congress to decide by prompt action the important question of the coinage of silver, and let the producers, the merchants, and the manufacturers of the country know what can be relied upon as a final settlement of the question. The petition is regardless of politics, and states that the continued agitation of the silver question is materially affecting values and the status of trade in all branches of the cereals, cotton, provisions, &c., and in the manufacturing interest.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of Thomas G. Corbin, a captain on the retired-list of the Navy, praying for the passage of an act placing him on the retired-list of rear-admirals; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not a unanimous report. The minority of the committee are opposed to the report as presented by the majority, and we may desire to submit the views of the minority in writing. I believe the majority have their views in writing.

Mr. BLAIR. They have, and it is understood that the minority might desire to submit their views and have time to do it.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is the same joint resolution that was reported at the last Congress?

Mr. BLAIR. It is the same phraseology.

Mr. COCKRELL. At the last Congress there was a majority and a minority report printed upon it, and the minority have not changed their views.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 929) for the relief of Albert H. Emery, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 23) giving a military record to Thomas Miller, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

PRINTING OF ARGUMENTS ON PENSION LEGISLATION.

Mr. BLAIR. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions to ask an order to print 1,000 copies of the remarks of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic on general pension legislation before the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks an order of the Senate to print 1,000 copies of a certain document entitled "Hearing before the Committee on Pensions of the Senate of the United States of the committee on pensions of the Grand Army of the Republic" for the use of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAWES. All such bills have heretofore been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I do not know that the committee are desirous of keeping them in that committee, but there must be some reason why they are taken from that committee and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I have only one objection to the bills going to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but I do not care about stating it now.

Mr. DAWES. I do not care to make a motion to have the bill come to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I only say that that is what the committee was appointed for.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I will state to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that these bills relate exclusively to Indian depredation claims.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on Claims have been in the habit of reporting them back and sending them to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REMOVALS AND SUSPENSIONS FROM OFFICE.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I offer a resolution, which I think it is necessary I should read myself, as it has some interpolations in such form as possibly they will not be read at the desk as they were intended. It is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Executive of the United States is not restricted by Constitution or law in removing or suspending appointees; that the Senate has no constitutional right to require that reasons shall be given for such removals or suspensions; but that it is the right of the Senate to call for any papers relating to the conduct of removed or suspended appointees, or to the qualification and fitness of all persons whose names are presented to the Senate for confirmation or rejection, and it is the duty of the Executive to comply with all demands for the same.

I ask the Senate to consider this resolution to-day.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator from Missouri to permit me simply to make a statement before he interposes his objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; I withdraw the objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. My object in presenting the resolution is to get this question before the Senate in open debate. It does not involve any of the so-called high prerogatives of the Senate when it shall go into executive or secret session, but only the abstract question as to whether the Executive can be called upon and required to give reasons for removals. That is all that is involved in the resolution.

All appointments sent in here, all treaties sent in here, can be treated just as the Senate has heretofore acted on all matters of that sort. This is a resolution that goes to the abstract question as to whether we can ask the President for reasons. The resolution says we can not require an answer. We can ask, of course, but we can not require an answer. It says further that we can ask for the reasons for an appointment. That is all, sir.

I ask that the resolution, if the Senator from Missouri wants it to go over, shall only be considered to-day as an endeavor on my part to bring the matter to public discussion and keep it out of executive session.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will first be read, subject to objection.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama will first allow the resolution to be read at the desk.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. There is. I object. Let it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri objects, and under the rules the resolution is not open to debate.

Mr. PUGH. I desire to give notice——

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. PUGH. I desire to give notice that not later than to-morrow I shall offer a substitute for the resolution. I thought I had it in my drawer, and that I should be able to offer it at this time, so that it might be printed; but I remember that I handed it to a Senator who is not in his seat this morning. As soon as he comes in I shall ask leave to offer it and to have it printed, so that I may make a motion to substitute it for the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that the resolution lie on the table until probably in the course of a few minutes, or very soon, the Senator shall obtain his substitute, and then the order to print will include both.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will state to the Senators that my only purpose is to bring this single question up for public discussion, and I have no objection to letting the resolution lie over. I do not think now that I shall have a word to say on the subject, but I regard it as one of the questions which ought to be discussed with open doors. That is my only purpose in offering the resolution, and any suggestion as to a day or a week's delay will be acceptable to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table for the present.

NEW NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the report of the National Academy of Sciences upon the advisability of building a new naval observatory, submitted in December last.

TRAVIS'S PORTRAIT OF LINCOLN.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library are instructed to inquire into the advisability of the purchase of the life-size portrait of Abraham Lincoln, painted by the late G. W. F. Travis in the winter of 1864–'65.

SAMUEL STRONG.

Mr. STANFORD. I offer the following concurrent resolution, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, and acting jointly, to investigate and report upon certain charges made before a committee of the Senate in the year 1853 which were claimed to reflect upon the official conduct of Samuel Strong during his superintendency of the Capitol extension, which charges then made in his absence and subsequently dropped on his return are now being revived, it is alleged, in the attempt to damage his character; and the said joint committees are empowered to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator from California if he will not consent to an amendment of the resolution? I see that he proposes that the committee of the Senate and the House shall act jointly. I ask the Senator to amend it by saying "concurrently," so that the Committee of the Senate may not be swallowed up by numbers.

Mr. HOAR (to Mr. MORRILL). The resolution is to be referred to your committee. You can amend it there.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that amendment will be made, or it can be made in committee, whichever is most convenient. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REPRINTING OF BANKRUPTCY BILL.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. 3) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, with the index, be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yesterday morning I presented a petition of the Kansas City Clearing House Association in regard to the extension of the laws of the United States over the Indian Territory, and it was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I ask now that the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, that committee having in charge the special subject of the extension of the courts over that Territory. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], agrees to this course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that change of reference will be made. The Chair hears none.

STATUES OF COLUMBUS, LAFAYETTE, AND GARFIELD.

Mr. VOORHEES. I rise for the purpose of calling up and asking action by the Senate on the joint resolution of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], which was under consideration yesterday, touching the designation of a proper place for a statue to Lafayette and also a contemplated statue to Columbus.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 35) setting apart public reservations for statues to Columbus, Lafayette, and James A. Garfield.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have no purpose at all to discuss the question. I listened with pleasure and interest to the eloquence and humor of my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] yesterday. I did not gather that he was so much opposed to it as to seriously antagonize the measure.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate, however, to one fact which perhaps is not very familiar, for we all forget things rapidly here. During the last session of the last Congress an appropriation of $50,000 was made for the erection of a statue to General Lafayette. The designs are now being submitted. The work has not been assigned to anybody as yet, but soon will be. Having made this appropriation, it follows as a necessity that Congress shall designate the proper location for the statue already authorized. So there is nothing new in this matter except a statue to the discoverer of the New World.

As to the location of these two contemplated statues, I think the places pointed out by the Senator from Vermont are commanding and proper. I have been one who has commented with such severity as I could command upon improper localities and low grounds throughout this city; but there is only one Capitol Hill, and these two approaches to the Capitol from the main front it seems to me should be reserved for the most conspicuous characters in our history who are yet without these honors.

I know of no statue to Columbus that might be spoken of as such. The matter of the propriety as to General Lafayette is past, because we have legislated upon the subject.

There is another character who ought to be put in marble in some conspicuous place in this District. There is no statue to William Penn, and I have had it in my mind for some time to bring that question forward. I do not know but what if it had been left to me I might have designated one of these places on the west front of the Capitol for a statue to William Penn instead of to Christopher Columbus, giving to Columbus some entire and conspicuous square elsewhere; but I am well satisfied with the matter in the shape it is.

As to the propriety and the utility of erecting statues to departed worth and greatness, that has passed beyond the domain of discussion. While some of our works of art are open to criticism, yet we are doing our part in that great cultivated field as well perhaps as those who are disposed to critieise us.

I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the joint resolution be read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read at length.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. CONGER. I hope that resolution will go over for further consideration and reflection at least. I do not know that I am entirely alone in my views that the passage of the resolution would be a matter of regret to us all if it should become a law. There can be, of course, no objection to its going over for a few days to give time for looking at these sites and for reflection in regard to them.

I feel certain that in the future, when the prancing horse in front of the Executive Mansion in Lafayette Square is weary of his position, that will be the appropriate place in front of the executive home of the President for the statue of Lafayette. I deem it an appropriate place, a desirable one, and one that would commend itself to the judgment of all Senators and of all the people of the United States. The name of the square was given to it to honor this great man. At an early day it was selected as the name of the square by Washington, a square laid out by the Frenchman who laid out this city, and a place the most prominent in the city, not part of the executive grounds, but facing them, was designated as a square to be honored by the name of Lafayette and appropriated as a continual and perpetual monument to the memory of Washington's friend and the friend of this country. In the equestrian statue now there there is nothing to indicate any great event in the history of the country; there is nothing but a flying Pegasus without wings. There is no reason why that monument already there should be in the center of Lafayette Square.

I am more and more astonished that the committee in charge of this question, whose taste and judgment commend themselves to the minds of other Senators, should not have reflected on this more and should not have selected a little more appropriate place for a monument to Lafayette than the low ground at the foot of the hill and on the banks of Goose Creek.

I wish this might go over, if there is no objection, for a reasonable time, say a week. If the Senator objects, I move that the consideration of this question be postponed for one week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves to postpone the further consideration of this joint resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have never refused a request made by any Senator for a reasonable postponement for the purpose of looking into a question; but I do not wish this postponement by a vote of the Senate. It is not necessary to be done, and I do not want it postponed to any distant day. How long does the Senator desire the matter to be deferred until he can look into it? I say I never refuse a request of that kind.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator did not, but the chairman of the committee who reported the resolution did intimate an objection to my request.

Mr. VOORHEES. That may be true.

Mr. CONGER. I think a few days hence would do to give Senators an opportunity to look at the sites and think over the matter.

Mr. VOORHEES. If it will be agreeable to the Senator I will say that I shall call it up at some hour on Thursday, the day after to-morrow, and ask for a vote of the Senate then.

Mr. CONGER. That would be better than to act upon it this morning.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will that do?

Mr. CONGER. To have it postponed a little longer would be more agreeable. Senators may have no time to go over the city and up hill and down and think upon the appropriateness of the proposed sites between now and Thursday.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will agree with the Senator from Michigan to call it up again a week from this day, at this hour.

Mr. CONGER. I will withdraw my motion with that understanding.

Mr. VOORHEES. With the understanding that we are to vote then?

Mr. CONGER. I have no desire to delay action upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be considered as the pleasure of the Senate that this joint resolution shall take its place on the Calendar subject to be called up on motion.

RECEIVERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. With the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, I ask the Senate to take up for consideration a bill reported by him from that committee, which will, I presume, cause no discussion. I understand it has the unanimous assent of the committee. It is Senate bill 1136, Order of Business 98.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1136.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 1136) additional to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," passed June 3, 1864, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that whenever the receiver of any national bank duly appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency, and who shall have duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of his trust, shall find it in his opinion necessary, in order to fully protect and benefit his trust to the extent of any and all equities that such trust may have in any property, real or personal, by reason of any bond, mortgage, assignment, or other proper legal claim attaching thereto, and which property is to be sold under any execution, decree of foreclosure, or proper order of any court of jurisdiction, he may certify the facts in the case, together with his opinion as to the value of the property to be so sold, and the value of the equity his trust may have in the same, to the Comptroller of the Currency, together with a request for the right and authority to use and employ so much of the money of the trust as may be necessary to purchase such property at such sale.

Mr. MORRILL. This bill has passed the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency, and it applies to a case where some considerable amount of the assets of a bank is tied up by proceedings in a State court and is about to be sold, and the bill provides that the receiver may use funds of the bank which have already been covered into the Treasury for the purpose of protecting the interest of the creditors of the bank by seeing that the property which is about to be sold by order of the State court shall not be sold for less than its value. There are two or three amendments, I think, reported by the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Finance will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment of the committee is in line 5, of section 2, before the words "of the Treasury," to strike out "Solicitor" and insert "Secretary;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That such request, if approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, shall be, together with the certificates of facts in the case, and his recommendation as to the amount of money which, in his judgment, should be so used and employed, submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and if the same shall likewise be approved by him, the request shall be by the Comptroller of the Currency allowed, and notice thereof, with copies of the request, certificate of facts, and indorsement of approvals, shall be filed with the Treasurer of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 3, line 10, after the word "direct," to insert "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. That whenever any such request shall be allowed as hereinbefore provided, the said Comptroller of the Currency shall be, and is, empowered to draw upon and from such funds of any such trust as may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States for the benefit of the bank in interest, to the amount as may be recommended and allowed and for the purpose for which such allowance was made: Provided, however, That all payments to be made for or on account of the purchase of any such property and under any such allowance shall be made by the Comptroller of the Currency direct, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for such purpose only and in such manner as he may determine and order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 13, of section 3, after the word "order," to strike out the following proviso:

And provided further, That no money shall be paid by the Comptroller of the Currency under the provisions of this act for or on account of the purchase of any such property, except the said receiver shall have obtained an order out of the district court of the United States for the district in which the bank of which he is the receiver is located, authorizing him to bid for and purchase the said property; and a certified copy of such order shall be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHURCH AND STATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is now in order under Rule VIII. The first business on the Calendar is the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] January 11, 1886, in relation to the appointment of officers of the United States to participate with the officers of any church, &c.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Alabama I think was taken from the floor by the expiration of the morning hour yesterday.

Mr. MORGAN. I seek no further participation in debate on these resolutions, and unless some Senator desires to amend them I ask for a vote upon them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions proposed by the Senator from Alabama, which will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Whereas the union of church and state in the conduct of a joint administration of the temporal or spiritual affairs of any church or religious sect or society is dangerous to the freedom of religious worship and opinion, and violates the principles of the Constitution of the United States:

Resolved, 1. That in the opinion of the Senate it is not within the power of Congress to appoint officers of the United States, by whatever name they may be called, who shall, in the name of, or on behalf of, the United States, be required to participate with the officers of any church or religious sect or society, whether or not the same is incorporated, in the joint conduct and administration of the spiritual or temporal affairs of such church, sect, or society.

2. That it is a practical violation of the Constitution for the President of the United States to appoint any such officer under any law which assumes to confer such power on him, and that requires such duties to be performed by such appointee as are mentioned in the first resolution, and that fixes upon them a direct accountability or responsibility to the executive or legislative department of the Government of the United States for their conduct in office.

3. That it is not the constitutional function of the executive or legislative department of the Government of the United States to exert control in the direction and administration of the religious or temporal affairs of any church or religious sect or society; but such power, if it may be in any case lawfully exerted by any department of the Government of the United States, can only be exercised by the judicial department.

4. That the power of Congress to grant charters of incorporation to religious societies in localities under its exclusive jurisdiction does not extend to and include the right or authority to participate in the administration of the affairs of such incorporations through the agency of officers of the United States appointed for such purpose and accountable to the Government for their conduct in office.

Mr. ALLISON. Are not these resolutions, in principle at least, in conflict with a bill which has recently passed the Senate?

Mr. MORGAN. With one feature of that bill they are in direct conflict.

Mr. ALLISON. That bill was debated at great length after having been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. It seems to me that these resolutions ought to be considered more at length before they are adopted by the Senate, so soon at least after adopting a different principle in the way of legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa object to the consideration of the resolutions on the Calendar under Rule VIII?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not suppose that to be in order at this moment.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not care to object; I only call attention to the importance of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from Alabama desires to speak on this subject either to justify his own action or to assail that of the majority of the Senate, of course I have no disposition to interfere with that; but if we are to be called upon to express our opinion on a question involving considerations like those which I suppose to be presented in these resolutions, I am clear that we ought to have the consideration of a committee; and rather than be called upon at this time to vote ay or no upon a resolution with whose terms I am really unfamiliar, and about whose consequences I should be unable to predict, I will move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, or any other committee that will be agreeable to the Senator from Alabama, in order that if this subject is to be again presented for debate we may have the opportunity for deliberation.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, yesterday I made all the observations that I desire to make upon these resolutions, not for the purpose of vindicating any vote I had given, or censuring any vote that anybody else had given, but for the purpose of antagonizing in these resolutions the proposition the Senate voted into the Utah bill, that the Government of the United States could be represented in a church organization, and in a church board by officers appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, who were required to report directly to the Secretary of the Interior. It occurred to me that that was a very great stretch of power. Attention was called to it during the debate on the Utah bill, and I thought it was entirely proper that the deliberate sense of the Senate should be taken on that proposition, inasmuch as we had voted it into the bill, as a naked constitutional question, one that does involve the duty of the President in making appointments under that bill if it shall become a law. So I presented my views yesterday after these resolutions were laid upon the Calendar for some days, and were printed and on the desk of every Senator. Now, a Senator from the Committee on the Judiciary, which reported the Utah bill, moves the reference of this subject to that or some other committee. Of course, if it goes back from this body for consideration, it ought to go to the Judiciary Committee; but the Judiciary Committee reported the Utah bill with this feature in it, and I supposed, of course, that they had made up their minds upon it. I supposed that that committee had thoroughly committed itself to the proposition that we could introduce into a church organization in this country a board of United States officers who should sit in company with other trustees of that organization, and who should, as such officers, report to the Secretary of the Interior, and that those officers should also be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

The antagonism between the proposition I bring forward by these resolutions and the action of the committee in reporting that bill was so very obvious, so very distinct, that I thought perhaps the committee had taken issue with the proposition as a proposition of constitutional law, and that they would not want any further consideration of it. But if the committee feel that they have acted in haste in this matter or without due consideration, and that they would prefer to have further time to look over the field to examine into this grave constitutional difficulty, I shall not object to its going back; I shall only send along with the resolutions on my part an humble petition that they may be considered and reported to the Senate for its action, and that they shall not be shelved. Of course that committee would not do such a thing as that intentionally, but they might do it in the mere pressure of their business.

The importance of the question can not be doubted. Every church in every Territory of the United States and in the District of Columbia, to say nothing, perhaps, of other churches, is open now, on the vote of the Senate taken on that feature of that bill, to have introduced into it by an act of Congress a body of officers of the United States to sit in conference with the officers of the church to regulate its temporal affairs. If that body, according to the organization and constitution of the church, as was decided in the case that I read from yesterday in the Supreme Court of the United States, has also a spiritual control of the church and can control the trustees so as to make them accommodate their temporal action to the spiritual necessities of the church, then Congress has but one step further to take to control the spiritual destiny of every church in this District and in the Territories, and that is to say that their trustees ought to be there with all the powers that belong to any other members of the church or any other trustees of the church.

The question is up. I did not bring it up. It was put into that bill. I did not put it there. It came here with the consent of the Committee on the Judiciary, and the Senate voted it into the bill; and they did it, too, after the best efforts that I could make to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this grave constitutional difficulty was in the bill.

Now, sir, there is not a religious denomination in the United States that will not feel that its power, its rightful jurisdiction on subjects with regard to its worship, its control, is attacked in this bill, in principle at least, and I can not consent that the subject should pass out of view without bringing it again to the attention of the Senate to ask its more deliberate judgment upon the great constitutional question involved.

As I observed yesterday, I repeat that church and state were divorced in this country before our Constitution was adopted. The divorce was ratified and confirmed when the Constitution was adopted. They are now reunited in the Utah bill and by the vote of the Senate. The nuptials have been celebrated again, and I repeat what I said yesterday, it is a disagreeable incident in this matter that these nuptials between church and state, so long divorced, have been recelebrated upon the polygamous altar of the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter-day Saints in Utah. If we want to celebrate the nuptials between church and state in this country and to unite and incorporate them together, do not let us go to that altar for the purpose of having the ceremony performed.

This bill does place officers, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, with duty to report to the Secretary of the Interior, as managing officers in a church board to act in company with thirteen Mormons in the conduct of such of the affairs of that church as fall under their jurisdiction in the nature and character of its organization; and these men are required to report their doings to the Secretary of the Interior. What we shall do with the report when it is made I am unable to conjecture. I suppose that it may furnish a basis for further legislation to see whether that church has been conducted according to its faith and doctrine, or whether it has been perverted from its faith and doctrine by the action of our trustees or any others—whether its property is being used for lawful or unlawful purposes. But it makes no difference what legislation we may predicate upon a report of that kind, the power is assumed on the part of the Congress of the United States, through officers of the Government of the United States, to take part in the control and management of a church.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolutions to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors; and

A bill (H. R. 989) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 377) granting a pension to Matthias Leckner; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

GEORGE W. GETTY.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 225) to authorize Col. George W. Getty, United States Army, retired, to be placed upon the retired-list of the Army with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general.

Mr. SEWELL. There is quite a lengthy report in this case; but I prefer to make a statement in a few words of the reasons which induced the Military Committee to report the bill. The report can then be read if any Senator desires.

The Committee on Military Affairs in the past five years have selected but three officers, as I now recollect, for legislation to retire them with a higher grade than that of their lineal rank in the service at the time of their retirement. General Getty was one of those officers, General Meigs was another, and General Hunt the third. They were cases of peculiar merit, officers that were in the service long prior to the late war, in fact prior to the Mexican war, and took part in the Indian wars of that period, officers who served at Churubusco, Chapultepec, Molino del Rey, and the other great successes of our arms in Mexico, for which they received brevets. At the outbreak of the late war these officers were in the full vigor of manhood, with large experience, and they took rank with high command early in the war. At the close of the war they were assigned to duty with the brevet rank of major-general in the regular service, and commanded divisions in the Army from 1862 up to the time of their retirement.

In the case of General Meigs, the committee reported the year before last that he should be retired one grade higher than his lineal rank at the time of his retirement, although he had been serving on duty with the brevet rank for a period of over twenty years, and Congress passed the bill. In the case of General Hunt a similar report was made last year, but the bill was not reached and it will be renewed this year. In the case of General Getty, he has been retired with the rank of colonel. The committee think that his services to the Government for a period covering nearly fifty years fully entitle him for the few short years of his life to the additional pay and honor that the increase of rank one grade would give him, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I prefer that the bill shall lie over for the present, if the Senator from New Jersey does not insist on proceeding with it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is open to objection.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection if the Senator from Illinois desires it to lie over, but it has been on the Calendar some time.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator that I really did not know anything about its being reported. What I desire is to discuss at the proper time the principle involved in this bill, not by way of objection to General Getty, but as to the rule that has prevailed and ought to prevail in reference to propositions of this kind.

My attention was not called to the bill; I mean by that to say that I have no recollection of it. It was no doubt referred to the committee for consideration. As I say, I make my request for delay not with the desire to oppose this particular bill, but to consider the general features that are found in this bill, which cover quite a number of cases that are now before the committee. If the bill shall pass, of course it will settle the question of principle. I have some papers that I desire to refer to.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to the Senator from Illinois naming his own time. I do not like to put off a case of this kind to an indefinite period.

Mr. LOGAN. Any time after I return home and get a list that I have there; to-morrow or any other day will answer.

Mr. SEWELL. Can it be called up by agreement?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, at any time. I only ask that it be deferred for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie over, keeping its place on the Calendar.

REMOVALS AND SUSPENSIONS FROM OFFICE.

Mr. PUGH. I now ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution of which I gave notice a short time ago. I will read it:

Resolved, 1. That "the executive power" is expressly "vested" by the Constitution "in the President" of the United States, so that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

2. That the power of appointment to Federal office is an executive power, to be exercised by the President under the limitation in the Constitution that "he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint."

3. That the power of removal or suspension from the powers and duties of Federal office is also an executive power, vested exclusively in the President, without any such limitation in the Constitution as is imposed thereby on the power of appointment, and for its exercise he is responsible alone to the people, and not to the Senate.

4. That the right of the President to make nominations to the Senate and of the Senate to advise and consent thereto are each separate and independent rights, to be exercised by the President and Senate respectively and separately and independently within their absolute discretion; but in relation to the person or persons so nominated the Senate may request information of the President affecting the character or qualifications of those as to whose appointment he asks the advice and consent of the Senate.

5. That when the President makes nominations to the Senate of persons to be appointed by him to exercise the powers and duties of Federal officers who have been removed or suspended by him, no law, public duty, or public policy requires that he shall send or communicate to the Senate any cause, reason, or information within his own knowledge, or contained in any letters, petitions, papers, or documents addressed to him or any member of his Cabinet, or in the possession of either, and relating to the subject of removals or suspensions, or containing charges, causes, or reasons, and the proof thereof, for making such removals or suspensions, and no law, public duty, or public policy requires or authorizes the Senate to call for such information existing in any such form from the President or any member of his Cabinet to enable the Senate to review or question the action of the President in exercising his executive, discretionary, and exclusive power of removing or suspending Federal officers from the powers and duties of their office, or to put the President on trial by the Senate, or to enforce accountability to the Senate for anything he may have done in the exercise of such jurisdiction.

6. That to obtain information considered by either House of Congress useful in passing necessary and proper laws, either House of Congress may request the President, if not deemed by him incompatible with the public interest, to give any information within his own knowledge, or contained in any public documents or records on file or in the lawful custody of any of the Departments and relating to the administration of any public office or the official conduct or acts affecting the official conduct or duties of any public officer; but for the Senate to make such request of the President or to direct any member of his Cabinet to transmit to the Senate any information or any public documents or other papers in open or executive session to enable the Senate in open or executive session to review the propriety or the cause or the information upon which he acted or may have acted in making removals or suspensions, would be an attempt to obtain such information by false pretenses and for uses and purposes not authorized or justified by any law or public policy of the United States; and should the President grant such request or require any member of his Cabinet to obey such direction from the Senate when deemed by him to have been made for such unjustifiable and unlawful uses and purposes, would be to recognize and encourage an improper practice and a dangerous innovation upon his exclusive and independent rights, powers, and duties as President of the United States.

I ask that this resolution be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks the unanimous consent of the Senate——

Mr. PUGH. I will offer it as a substitute for the resolutions proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER].

Mr. HOAR. Does the printing include the stump speech in the belly of the resolution as well as the resolution itself?

Mr. INGALLS. Oh, yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is for the Senate to determine. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take up for consideration at this time the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia with the view that his amendments may be offered to it and that all be laid over until to-morrow and printed.

Mr. INGALLS. That there may be no misunderstanding on this subject, I give notice now that to-morrow I shall move to refer the original resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the motion of the Senator from Alabama, and that motion is considered agreed to. The resolution will be considered as pending, and the amendment to the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama will be ordered to be printed with the resolution.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 2d instant, approved and signed the act (S. 671) making an appropriation for the purchase of the old Produce Exchange building and the site bounded by Whitehall, Pearl, Moore, and Water streets, New York city, for army purposes.

PEARSON C. MONTGOMERY.

The bill (S. 18) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., was announced as in order on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say to the Senator from Kansas that the bill was reported at the last session of the Senate and passed the Senate without objection.

Mr. INGALLS. That was because my attention was not called to it.

Mr. HARRIS. Perhaps that may have been the case, but it is certainly the fact.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] who is chairman of the Committee on Claims reported the bill, and the state of his health is known, I suppose, to all Senators. It is possible that he may have some desire in regard to the consideration of the bill at a particular time, or as to moving to take it up, or asking a Senator to waive an objection for an explanation when he comes in. He is unwell this morning, and I ask the Senator from Kansas to consent that the bill may stand, reserving his right until to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly; there can be no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection to that course, the bill will stand over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

DECORATIONS TO CONSUL RAWICZ.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1053) to permit Joseph Rawicz, United States consul at Warsaw, Russia, to accept certain decorations tendered him by the Russian Government.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations January 13:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of State of December 17, 1885 (Senate Ex. Doc. No. 11), recommending the passage of an act to permit Joseph Rawicz, United States consul at Warsaw, Russia, to accept decorations from Russia, have the honor to submit herewith a bill for the purpose mentioned, with recommendation that it do pass.

The committee find that for many years Mr. Rawicz has discharged the duties of United States consul at Warsaw without receiving any compensation therefor; that the Russian Government has tendered him certain decorations for services rendered his own country (he being a Russian subject), which, as he holds an office of trust under the United States, he is not at liberty to accept without the consent of Congress specifically given, while, as a subject of Russia, he can not decline them. The committee are of the opinion that, in view of all the circumstances, Congress may very properly accede to the request of Mr. Rawicz that he may be permitted to accept the honors referred to.

The letter of the Secretary of State referred to is submitted herewith and made a part of this report.

[Senate Ex. Doc. No. 11, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Letter from the Secretary of State, recommending the passage of an act to permit the United States consul at Warsaw, Russia, to accept decorations from Russia.

December 21, 1885, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 17, 1885.

SIR: I have the honor to send you inclosed extracts from dispatches Nos. 115 and 119 from Mr. Joseph Rawicz, consul of the United States at Warsaw, Russia, relating to certain decorations that have been conferred upon him by the Russian Government.

In accordance with Mr. Rawicz's request I respectfully recommend that a bill be passed granting him permission to accept said decorations. It is proper to add that the office held by Mr. Rawicz is compensated by fees, the amount of which is very insignificant, and that he is a Russian subject.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant.

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

No. 115.] CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Warsaw, June 5, 1885.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the State Department's two copies of the monthly consular reports, Nos. 47 and 48, one circular of April 9, and one dispatch, No. 61, of April 22 last.

In reply to the latter, I have the honor to state that, having been decorated by the Russian and French Governments, namely:

March 24, 1875, with the Order of St. Stanislaus, third class, for my services of twenty years as judge of the commercial court;

May 25, 1877, with the Order of St. Anna, third class, as member of the committee of Philadelphia Exhibition, held in 1876;

October 30, 1878, with the Red Cross;

September 25, 1880, with the French Cross of the Legion of Honor for the Paris Exhibition of 1878;

May 15 and June 25, 1883, with two Orders of St. Stanislaus, second class, for my services as member of the committee of the Warsaw Commercial School; and, finally,

February 28, 1885, with the Order of St. Anna, second class, as curator of the Warsaw Lunatic Asylum for ten years' services.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH RAWICZ,
United States Consul.

Hon. WILLIAM HUNTER,
Second Assistant Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

No. 119.] CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Warsaw, October 1, 1885.

SIR: * * * I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of dispatch No. 63, of July 15 last. In reply to the latter I have the honor to inform you that being at the head of the oldest local banking house, existing since 1769, I am frequently called to hold various Government and private honorary offices, as a president or member of committees.

This prominent position always enables me to decisively act in the behalf of this consulate, and this influential position becomes the more desirable, as this consulate is the only one not being general, and the latter circumstance greatly influences upon the official classification of foreign consuls in this country. Owing, however, to my personal position I am enabled in some measure to keep myself upon the level with the rights due to my colleagues, the consuls-general.

Many a time I requested the State Department for changing this consulate into a general one, never requiring any special pecuniary compensation or privilege, as I wanted only the title indispensable for the intercourse with the local authorities. Not wishing to be behind all other local consuls, I requested long ago for this title the Department of State by the mediation of some of the United States ministers passing through Warsaw to St. Petersburg, but I regret to say their mediation as well as their representations made the State Department remained till now entirely unconsidered.

The reason why the other European powers are represented here by the consuls-general is, that Warsaw was once the capital of the Kingdom of Poland.

As the subject of this country, I can not decline the acceptance of the Russian decorations, and therefore I respectfully beg you to pass the necessary formalities through the Congress relative to the orders already received by me.

* * * * * * *

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH RAWICZ,
United States Consul.

Hon. WILLIAM HUNTER,
Second Assistant Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not expect to stop this sort of thing, but I wish to say that I voted against this proposition in committee and I shall vote against it again.

This gentleman appears to have been receiving a series through several years long since past of what he calls Russian decorations, he being a Russian subject. It does not appear to have disturbed him in his relations to the United States down to this time, and I do not think it will if we do not happen to pass this bill. The idea of a republican country going into the business of authorizing citizens of our own, or especially subjects of any other country, to receive titles and decorations and such things is repugnant to my notions entirely, and, except in very extraordinary instances of some great public service in the interest of humanity that some officer of the United States sometimes does, I am opposed to the whole thing.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I can not believe that this is one of the cases which would properly come within the limitations of the provision of the Constitution on this subject, that reads as follows:

> No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state.

This provision of the Constitution certainly could not have been intended to apply to the subject of another dominion than ours. It would be an idle and nugatory and senseless provision to say that a citizen of Germany, owing allegiance to the German Emperor, who happened to be discharging a nominal office under the United States Government, should not have the right to accept any decoration or ornament that that potentate might see fit to bestow upon him. Here is Mr. Rawicz, who is by his own confession a citizen and subject of the Russian Empire——

Mr. VOORHEES. Allow me to ask the Senator from Kansas, why pass this bill? What aid does he need from us?

Mr. INGALLS. We are asked to pass it because the Committee on Foreign Relations has reported it. It is on the Calendar, and our affirmative action is invited.

I was about to proceed to say that this man is confessedly a Russian subject. He holds a nominal consulship under the Government of the United States, to which there is no salary attached. He is a resident of that empire, and in the discharge of his duties as a citizen of that empire the emperor has seen fit to decorate him with the insignia of certain orders that are peculiar to that country. If this provision of the Constitution covers a case like that, I certainly think it ought to be amended. As the Senator from Vermont states, this man has experienced no embarrassment heretofore; there is no way by which he can be reached by the Government of the United States and the powers of the Constitution if he does accept these decorations. We might remove him from the office, but it pays no salary and has no emoluments; therefore he would be subjected to no discomfiture or loss.

I believe also that an officer of the United States, properly so called, is compelled to take an oath to support the Constitution and laws of this country, which I do not suppose this man ever did. I do not learn that a citizen of a foreign power accepting a petty nominal consulate under the State Department is required to take an oath to support the Constitution and laws of this country, and I therefore think that this bill is frivolous. Even if this person were a citizen of this country, I should think it was an inconsequential thing to do. I have no respect for an American citizen who will come here and ask that he may have the permission of Congress to wear some foreign gewgaw, some jewel, some decoration, some painted ribbon, some article of adornment that he thinks is essential either to his personal appearance or to his self-esteem, and still more in the case of a foreign subject, I submit that it is preposterous to ask that this power of the Constitution shall be evoked.

I will venture, with great deference to a committee as important and dignified as the one that reported this bill, to move that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Foreign Relations could do no less than bring this bill to the attention of the Senate after the Secretary of State had sent the correspondence to us and had requested as follows:

> In accordance with Mr. Rawicz's request I respectfully recommend that a bill be passed granting him permission to accept said decorations.

The committee did not feel that they were justified in taking issue with the Secretary of State upon a question of this kind and smothering this bill in committee, or in reporting back that it should be indefinitely postponed, but thought they should rather present it to the Senate for its deliberate consideration. The opposition to the bill in the committee, I may be allowed to say, as one Senator has mentioned the fact that he opposed it, was not very large; still it was very important. The committee have not felt that they were dealing in a trifling way with a trifling subject at all. This gentleman is a Russian subject. He is a banker of eminence in the city of Warsaw. He is a man of very high respectability, and the Government of the United States, for reasons best known to the diplomatic functionaries, have found it necessary or proper, through many administrations, to invite him to accept the consulate at that place. He has discharged the duties there entirely to the satisfaction of the Government; but he finds that he can not either maintain his social position dependent upon his personal merits or his proper rank in official circles unless he conforms to the usages of the country of which he is a citizen by accepting and wearing the decorations that belong to that state of society.

Mr. INGALLS. Let him wear them.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, let him wear them; and let him wear also the contempt of the Senator from Kansas, and perhaps that would be an additional decoration.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no contempt for him.

Mr. MORGAN. I supposed the Senator had expressed nothing else. He is an honorable gentleman, who makes an appeal to the Government of the United States to allow him to conduct an office that we confer upon him and ask him to take in such a manner as will not interfere with his social position or with his relations to his own government.

Mr. VOORHEES. May I ask my friend from Alabama what the necessity of a bill by the American Congress is to authorize a subject of Russia to wear anything that Russia sees fit to put on him?

Mr. MORGAN. I reply to that by asking what necessity there is for the Government of the United States to appoint a Russian to any office?

Mr. VOORHEES. That is getting into deep water.

Mr. MORGAN. Not any deeper than the other, because if we invite a citizen of Russia to take one of our honorable offices we must expect to permit him to do as Russians do in his own country; and if we find that there is an objection to following Russian customs and accepting honors from his own government because of the fact that he holds an office that we invite him to hold, it is as little as we can do to remove the difficulty.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Russian Government object to the wearing of these decorations?

Mr. MORGAN. I am not in communication with the Russian Government, not being any part of the diplomatic body of the United States. The Senator from Kansas can indulge his own imagination on that question, which is very vivid, and I suppose he can find out.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator stated that the reason why it was necessary this bill should be passed was to enable him to retain his social position in the Russian Empire.

Mr. MORGAN. I say that is what he says about it.

Mr. INGALLS. And the Senator thinks we should invoke a constitutional provision to allow Mr. Rawicz to maintain his social position in the Russian Empire.

Mr. MORGAN. I say that is what Mr. Rawicz and the Secretary of State both think about it, and therefore it is a subject for the respectful consideration of the Senate, not a subject that can be hooted out of this body with a remark on the other side. It may tickle the fancy of a subject of the Russian Government to wear a decoration that comes from that government, and it may be very amusing to Americans to see him in that grotesque attitude. At the same time we can not quite change the customs of Russia or its traditions; and when we put ourselves in the attitude of inviting a citizen of a foreign country to discharge consular functions for us within that country we must necessarily say to him, "We do it in deference to your citizenship, to the peculiarities of your country; and if you want to wear tinsel on your breast as an indication of your rank, or of your belonging to a certain class of society, we have no reasonable right to object."

Now a grave constitutional question has sprung up here as to whether it is really necessary that we should remove an impediment to this man's wearing this decoration if he pleases. I do not know that I am prepared to settle that question, even in my own mind, very definitely. I only find that no one holding an office under the Government of the United States shall be permitted to wear these decorations except by the consent of Congress. Our fathers, fearing perhaps the power of foreign governments to entice men from their allegiance by decorating them with honors and with offices of this character, put a prohibition in the Constitution the value of which I confess to have never been able to exactly see; but there it is, and here is an oath to support it. We must, therefore, in every case where a man is an officer of the Government of the United States, enable him to receive these decorations while he holds the office. It may be true that this man is not an officer of the United States. If it is true, he has no business in the service. But the Senate passes continually appropriations and recognitions in every form of the right of foreign men in foreign countries to serve us in these consular capacities. I object to it now, as I have always done, and I trust that at least one good result may come from this debate, which will be that hereafter we shall have a law which shall provide that no man can hold an office under the United States Government in any country unless he is a citizen of the United States. I believe in being represented by our citizens in every office that we think is of sufficient dignity to entitle a foreigner to occupy it, whether it pays him five dollars a year or fifty thousand.

I would, with the Senator from Kansas and other Senators who have spoken, spurn an American raised under our institutions who should desire to receive a decoration of this kind from the Emperor of Russia, no matter how complimentary it might be to him, unless the event upon which he claimed to be entitled to it was one that proved his right to the recognition in some heroic light, such as saving human life or preventing the spread of disease, or something like that; and even then I would think it was bad taste in an American to desire to wear such gewgaws. But we are not making rules of taste for Americans; we are merely trying to preserve in the service of the Government under existing laws and regulations a valuable, competent gentleman who has long served us faithfully, a man of influence and of character at Warsaw, a large banker, by enabling him to receive these marks and decorations of respect from his own Government without thereby being compelled to leave our service. That is the whole question.

This gentleman, perhaps, does not want to remain in the service; perhaps he does; I do not know. I should judge he is willing to do it; otherwise he would not have sent the request. But it was the duty of the Secretary of State, who is represented abroad by this consul at Warsaw, and has no other representative there, when he made a request of this kind, to lay it before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it was the duty of the Committee on Foreign Relations to lay it before the Senate. Now, what the duty of the Senate may be let them decide. It is not for me to tell them further than by my own vote.

Mr. LOGAN. I always listen to the Senator from Alabama with great pleasure. He has a persuasive manner that almost convinces us on any subject. But it is rather amusing to hear the appeal made by the Senator from Alabama asking the Senate of the United States to confer upon a citizen of another government, differing in form and in ever possible way from our own, some kind of decoration. What it is I do not know, nor do I know that the Senator from Alabama understands what the character of decoration is or for what the decoration is to be conferred.

I remember very well when I was quite a small boy—I do not know that other boys did the same as I did, but perhaps they did and do—I was very fond in those days of wrapping a blanket around me and of getting chains and rattling them and having rattles and things of that kind which please children. That is the child's stage; but when we pass from that to the stage of manhood, a man should stand before the world for what he is worth, and not because of gewgaws or decorations that may be fastened to his person or his clothes.

Now, because Russia grants a decoration for the benefit of this gentleman, as the Senator from Alabama says, that he may enter elegant society—I believe that is about the idea this gentleman has——

Mr. MORGAN. I prefer to allow the consul to explain himself. He has done it in his letter. I do not propose to make any explanation for him.

Mr. LOGAN. If that argument is good, let us see the logic of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senator from Illinois be allowed to proceed.

Mr. LOGAN. Inasmuch as I was taken off the floor yesterday in the same way, this is only repeating the dose. It is all right, however.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to make the announcement.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely desire to say in answer to the Senator from Alabama that if this eminent citizen of Russia with the decoration of office conferred upon him by the United States can not enter the elegant society of Russia until he is decorated by the Russian Government, then it is the decoration that enters the society and not the man. If he is not sufficiently elegant in his person, in his manners, in his character, to enter the society of Russia without being decorated as an American officer, I would say to him remain outside of it, come over here, and become a citizen of the United States, and we will decorate him by recognizing him as a citizen of the United States under the American flag, where he can have equal rights and go into any kind of society whatever, provided he is worthy of that society.

I do not believe in decorations. I have never voted for them in the Senate. Several times I believe persons have been permitted to be decorated by some foreign power that they might go in certain places wearing some sort of decoration upon their breast so that they might say that they did—what? They do not know themselves very frequently what they did which led to obtaining the decoration and nobody else does; but it is some little thing conferred upon a man because he desires it. That is the object of this. This man desires it, and that is all.

The point, however, is this: If we can confer upon this man the authority to accept a decoration from the Russian Government because he is an American consul, we are thereby indirectly conferring a decoration upon an American consul because he is an American consul. If we do that, every American consul may ask the same privilege, make the same request, or men may become citizens of foreign governments for the purpose of being decorated, by the assent of Congress, by foreign powers. I do not believe in that. I think it is wrong in every aspect. I believe the only decoration that an American citizen should wear is that decoration that makes him the equal of every other man by being an independent freeman, enjoying the rights and privileges of this great Republic.

I have ever been opposed to decorations. I have been opposed to giving the consent of Congress that our own citizens should be decorated for anything, it makes no matter what. When the time comes that a man shall pass away, let that which shall be written above his tomb decorate his character in living letters, if he is an honest man, a patriot, and an American citizen; let his decoration be that of his daily walk; let it be that of a man in his demeanor toward his fellow-men and his uprightness and his conduct and course in life, and that is the decoration which an American citizen should wear, and none other, in my judgment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is now in order, on which the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] is entitled to the floor. The Chair asks the Senator from New York to wait a few moments till some House bills are referred and some executive communications are presented.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 989) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 1st instant, information in relation to the proportion of bonds held by national banks of those called for payment March 1, 1886; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 29, 1886, information in relation to instructions to the assistant treasurer at New Orleans, La., concerning the receipt of silver dollars on deposit and the issuance of certificates therefor; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 20, 1886, information in relation to the employment of convict labor in the erection of the post-office building at Peoria, Ill.; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, this communication will be ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance. The accompanying documents are numerous. The question of their printing will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HOAR. Should not that communication go to the Committee on Education and Labor? It seems to relate to the vexed question of convict labor of which that committee has charge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts so move?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the communication be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of printing the accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I desire to present a few remarks to the Senate bearing particularly upon one topic that it seems to me, both in previous legislation and in the disposition of the matter attempted by the bill now before the Senate, has been too much overlooked. I shall favor the recommitment of the bill, with the amendments proposed, to the committee, in order that there may be a fuller examination and a more complete treatment of all the possible or probable occasions of mischief and misconstruction that may arise when the mere act of the counting of the vote is to be performed.

As my own opinions on the Constitution favor that view which has been discarded in the wisdom of Congress, to wit, the power and duty of the Vice-President to count the votes, it may be thought that I do not fairly interpret and estimate the methods that are provided for solving the difficulties which arise upon an attempt to count the votes by the two Houses of Congress; but I have a sincere desire that this matter to be treated by the two Houses shall be as well provided under circumstances of clear ascertainment and as far as may be from the immediate movement of popular or political feeling as is possible; and my experience in attending upon the discussions of the electoral count satisfies me that the greatest difficulties are from the very instant and very limited means by which any doubts are to be solved.

It will be noticed that until the votes are opened as provided under the Constitution there is no exhibition of doubt or of difficulty, of perplexity or of complication; and then you will observe that all the means at the service of the two Houses under the existing legislation on the subject is what is to be disclosed by the various and collected certificates bearing on the vote brought into the dispute. Nothing could in provision and prevision for so critical a state be more unfortunate than that the two Houses should be dependent for their information on what is to be gathered from the disclosures upon the opening of the envelopes, when all therein contained is intended to be and purports to be in pursuance only of the mere designation and security of the votes themselves. The legislation of Congress has been very meager, and quite as much as in the minds of the framers of the Constitution there have been absent from mind in legislation any of the forms and conditions and difficulties in the count that in the later experience of the Government have been exhibited.

Now, there are two quite independent topics in regard to which the Government of the United States is entitled to be certified in respect of the action of the several States, binding as to each of the States. Without intruding at all upon the independence of the States and their absolute possession of the manner and form in which they exercise this particular power, the Government of the United States has a perfect and complete right to know what the States have done; and while we have looked alone at the question of how the votes have been cast and the evidence and security that they were by the persons who had the right under the States' procedures to cast the votes, we have paid too little attention, as it seems to me, to that separate and independent right that we have to learn separately from what votes have been cast what electors have been appointed. I mean not in the sense of the men, but what States have appointed electors, and for this reason: The result of the count of the votes as produced and counted in disposing of the election of President and Vice-President must be brought not only into the ascertainment of the votes that have been properly cast and are thus to be held properly to be counted, but it is important to learn how large is the whole number and list of appointed electors under the action of the States in order for us to determine whether the count shows a failure of a majority, and thus the subsequent action of the Government is to be carried over to the House of Representatives, or whether the whole extent and comprehension of electors appointed has been reduced from what was possible in the computation of the States' collected votes when enumerated, so as to determine whether by the reduction of the apparent electoral colleges by the failure of appointments or the ascertainment of appointments there may be a reduction in the computation of whether a majority has been obtained by this or that candidate.

We have ready at hand, in the experience of the electoral colleges and electoral votes and the electoral count in 1876, an illustration of how important this might have become. There were 3 votes lawfully to be cast by Oregon. If those 3 votes were rejected under the provisions of the pending bill, or under the existing arrangement made by Congress for the count, it would have been apparent that President Hayes would have failed of a majority of the whole electoral college, and apparently therefore the election would have gone to the House of Representatives, as Mr. Tilden would have failed of a majority as well. But supposing the House of Representatives had been Republican, and if the election had gone there the Republican candidate would have been chosen by the House. But suppose that the 3 votes of Oregon had been rejected, and rejected upon the ground that electors had not been appointed—not that you could find in the actual circumstance the evidence which would justify that conclusion, but in the supposable circumstance that that was and should have been the rightful conclusion of rejection—then you would have seen that, having reduced by 3 the whole body of electoral votes to be computed and divided, Mr. Tilden having 184 votes would have been elected, because he would have had a majority by 184 of the whole electoral list reduced by 3.

How would you have had, and how could you have had, under the provisions of this bill, or under the provisions of the electoral count that were provided for that immediate situation, a clear and ready ascertainment as to whether this rejection of the votes was on the failure of appointments of electors or the regularity and the sufficiency of the vote? Happily in that case there was no difference as to the result, as the House was Democratic and he was the next candidate in the failure of Mr. Hayes's election. But in the opposite result I do not see that you have any adequate provision or materials before you for determining, when you have nothing but the question of counting the votes, how you have an ascertainment that is satisfactory to the mind of the two Houses and of the public on which ground a rejection takes place, and I know no more critical, no more embarrassing situation under our Constitution than a doubt produced in such a narrow state of votes as to whether the House can elect, or whether the next and inferior candidate is elected by his own right by having a majority of the reduced electoral colleges.

Nor can I find that in the inclosures of the envelopes which contain the votes would there naturally, certainly not necessarily, be produced the means upon which there should be so clear, so peremptory an ascertainment of the ground on which the votes were rejected as should satisfy the heated condition of Congress and the public mind on such a question.

In my experience, therefore, in watching and attending to the conduct of the vote of the electoral colleges, I have felt to my own satisfaction that the principal deficiencies and the principal obscurities for the ascertainment, whoever counted the votes, as to how they should be counted, grew out of the want of any provision in due time and by due certainty to ascertain who had been elected, or appointed as the phrase in the Constitution is, electors. Hence I have thought it was worthy the attention of the Senate and of the committee that has had charge of this business that that should be attended to, and that thus we could in advance have collected from the different States what this Government had a right to ask for and obtain—the results of the elections or appointments as soon as might be after the ascertainment under the laws of the States the results should have been reached; and that these thus should be separated in time, as well as in the publicity of the declaration, the completeness, and the security of this ascertainment, whether you call it canvass or by whatever scrutiny the States should propose.

In that view I have thought that a section should be added here which would make it the duty of the executive of each State, as soon as practicable after the final act of the State in the electoral appointment should have been ascertained by and under and in pursuance of the laws of that State, under the seal of State to communicate to this Government, the Secretary of State or the President of the Senate—that may be immaterial—the result of that process of the State by which it had reached the result of the appointment according to its own laws; and that this should contain and plainly set forth as the result and declaration of each canvass, that is, the canvass or ascertainment of each State, who had been appointed and what votes had been given or cast for every person voted for for that place. This is neither more nor less than is required for the security of elections in our own States. I presume without an exception every State provides not only for a competent and adequate scrutiny into the election and a simultaneous ascertainment of the result, but an open and public declaration under the authority of high official duty of the result.

I am satisfied, Mr. President, if this preliminary caution and security were made use of, the opportunities for doubt as you approach the mere opening of the votes and the hasty and unsatisfactory scrutiny of the mere contents of those opened envelopes would all disappear; for we should have, under as high a public authority as could be commanded and promptly after the final act of the State in the process of elections, this declaration communicated to this Government and made public by this Government, as it might and should properly do, so that at a period dating not long after the election, the date for which is prescribed by the acts of Congress, we should have published to the whole world what was declared by each State as the result, and not merely a certificate of a conclusion, but a statement of the final act of election itself—that is, the canvass and declaration of the polls.

Besides this provision, which I think would forestall almost all possible discussion that could be fairly wrested by party feeling from what should be plain and clear, I would require that this same statement should be furnished in triplicate by the governor to the electors, and that they should include it in their returns that they now make of their votes and of the list which the governor has given them of those who are appointed electors, so that then presently before the two Houses of Congress, as there would have been before the Vice-President if he had been intrusted with the count, by this provision of law there should be the means of confronting either the Vice-President or the House or the Houses who count and certify this certainty of knowledge on the subject. Perhaps, then, it would be considered entirely right that no vote that was communicated under these sanctions and with this ascertainment could properly be challenged by either House or brought into question unless both Houses should concur in some grave, some post hac occurrence that should disparage the absolute control given to this ascertainment.

Looking at the bill in all favor, as intended to remedy difficulties that exist, I think this matter should be attended to, and I am quite sure that in the apprehension of the public mind such a timely and such a prudent provision in regard to the facts which lie at the bottom of the right of the electors to vote would be not only secure, but would be seen to be so.

I confess a great repugnance to seeing the vote of a State rejected upon a mere difference of opinion between the two Houses, a rejection for the consequence of which nothing is necessary but that one House should make an objection and insist upon it, proposing, presenting for the public judgment no action of its own, but simply on its mere will interposing objection, not voting that the other certificate was entitled to present the votes, but simply each objecting as one objecting to these competing votes, so that the State falls absolutely and the immense rights that other States may have dependent upon that consequence fall under the mere political will of one House of Congress to make its objection.

All feel, I think, that it is an undesirable situation that by mere negation, by mere inability to agree, and without ascertainment of grounds or reasons, the vote goes out. All, I think, see that to be an inconvenience, and I have been disposed to think that after there had been developed this disparity in views between the two Houses, which was insisted upon, the proposition of the Senator from Ohio might be admitted, so that there might be an appeal at least to a determination which votes should be received; but I must confess that upon further consideration and under the light that has been presented in the debate, this collection of opinions of the members of the two Houses would, in my judgment, be wholly an unconstitutional assemblage and vote. In the Constitution, or in the conception of the political government which is deposited in Congress, I can find no ground to support this extra assemblage of the two Houses voting per capita.

I can not look with any complacency upon a reference to the Supreme Court or any judicial tribunal. I must regard, as I do sincerely, the whole transaction from the beginning to the end, and the declaration of the result, a political transaction to be governed by such moderation and duty and faculties as are reposed in those who fill the political stations that are to act upon the great transaction.

I do not look with any complacency upon the opening, by the second section of the bill, of judicial proceedings in the State below to intercept and interpret or suppress the vote of a State. I have regarded, and in spite of all that I have heard said on the subject I must still regard, that the framers of the Constitution looked with extreme solicitude upon the principal fact and result that a President should be chosen. They were indifferent as between parties or as between the nicety and certainty of results of justice, but their chief concern was that there should be a President chosen, and that the progress from the first act of voting up to the final declaration should be as little impeded and as little interrupted as possible. Why should they not have felt so, when they knew in all the experience of the mother country and of the western nations, that when birth provided the succession, simple as that method might be, a disputed succession as to which was the true king that was to appear, made the misery, the suffering, and the disasters in every form of the nation; and when we were attempting a new method that was to derive from the large vote of the great people this designation they felt that the first duty and that the first execution of their duty in that behalf was that the process should go on and that there should be a result.

I therefore must agree in the motion which has been made that the bill, with the amendments now proposed, should be sent back to the committee for a more accurate settlement of this great dispute. We are not under any influence from what has been said as to any oversight in the circumspection and astuteness with which the succession bill was provided, for I think that by all intelligent as to facts and conditions under which any bill by Congress can become a law under the restrictions of the Constitution, it will be found that this imagination that the framers of the succession bill had not provided for the little space between the electoral count and the 4th of March, their circumspection, and their astuteness, and their close attention showed that if there be that gap of misfortune, it is a misfortune that no power by the Constitution has been given to the two Houses of Congress to fill.

But it has been suggested to me, to me unfamiliar with the course of business here, that such a recommittal would be equivalent to reducing, if not destroying, the opportunities of the bill passing through the Senate at this session. I should regret any such consequence, and if it were necessary to avoid such a consequence, that the view I might submit in the amendment I have suggested, in common with those submitted by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Massachusetts, could be fairly, and fully, and accurately debated and settled in this body, I should desire that a committal should not be made necessary; but my own judgment of it is that if there be any value in the suggestions that I have made, and if the difficulties that are now felt as to the text as the bill reads without amendments, and doubt as to the proposed amendments, are really worthy of attention, the only true opportunity for an accurate adjustment and final and full satisfaction of the best course under the Constitution we can take will be reached only by a recommittal.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, defects in the Constitution of the United Statescan not be remedied by acts of Congress. The wisdom of the men who framed it was not equal to the task of formulating a perfect instrument. Fifteen articles have been added to it in the form of amendments. It is claimed that time and the peculiar political conditions which attend the affairs of the nation have discovered another defect. It is proposed to apply a remedy in the present instance by act of Congress. But this is not the method ordained by the Constitution. The bill we are now considering has not, in my judgment, the sanction of the Constitution. The reasons which support my judgment I will briefly state.

Article II of the Constitution defines and establishes the executive power and provides for the election of President and Vice-President of the United States. In the third paragraph of section 1 the mode of election was provided. It also prescribed the method by which the result of the election should be ascertained. In this respect it declared relative to the electors chosen by the respective States that—

> They shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each, which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate.

So far this is definite and well, but it does not determine a result. This must be provided for, and hence the paragraph provided immediately to declare how and by whom the result should be ascertained. In this respect it said:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all of the certificates, and the vote shall then be counted.

What does this language mean? How can we better answer this question than by going back to the time of the adoption of the Constitution and getting our data from the acts of the men who first started our Government on its course? Many of the men who composed the first Congress of the United States had participated in the deliberations of the body which framed the Constitution or had been members of the conventions of the several States by which the instrument had been considered and adopted. Surely we may safely consult them. Let us take this prudent course and see what the result will be.

The first public concurrent action of the two Houses of Congress brought there men to the duty of defining their understanding of the meaning of the Constitution in respect of its dealing with the ascertainment of the result of an election of President and Vice-President. It does not seem to have occurred to them that the problem was one of difficulty. In the simplest and most matter-of-fact way they entered upon their duty and discharged it. On pages 16 and 17 of volume 1 of the Annals of Congress it appears that on the 6th day of April, 1789, in the first session of the first Congress, the Senate took action, as follows, namely:

> Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, then appearing, took his seat, and formed a quorum of the whole Senators of the United States.
> The credentials of the members present being read and ordered to be filed, the Senate proceeded, by ballot, to the choice of a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States. John Langdon was elected.
> Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States, and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, submitting to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for a like purpose.

The House of Representatives, on being notified of this action by the Senate, adopted in response thereto a resolution as follows, namely:

> Resolved, That Mr. Speaker, attended by the House, do now withdraw to the Senate Chamber, for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate; and that Mr. Parker and Mr. Heister be appointed, on the part of the House, to sit at the Clerk's table with the member of the Senate, and make a list of the votes as they shall be declared.
> Mr. Ellsworth reported that he had delivered the message; and Mr. Boudinot, from the House of Representatives, informed the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet them, to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice-President of the United States.

And then it is recorded that—

> The Speaker and the members of the House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber; and the President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.

These proceedings clearly declare the construction which the Senators and Representatives of the First Congress put upon the provision of the Constitution relative to the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the several States in the matter of the election of President and Vice-President of the United States. Not by discussion, but by action, they pronounced their construction of the Constitution, and we can not mistake their meaning. They did not hold that the President of the Senate was to open the votes, and that some other officer, or person, or body was to count them and declare the result. The President of the Senate on that occasion elected was assigned to a definite duty; that duty was to open and count the votes delivered to him. It would seem that there can be no doubt as to the opinion held by the members of the First Congress on this subject. They proclaimed by their action that the duty to open the votes and the power to count them and to declare the result were devolved on the President of the Senate.

Both Kent and Story entertained this view of the subject. The former expressed his view in his Commentaries in this language:

The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes, and a closely contested election, this power may be all-important; and I presume in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators to witness the transaction and to act only if no choice be made by the electors.

And Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, says:

In the original plan, as well as in the amendment, no provision is made for the discussion or decision of any questions which may arise as to the regularity and authenticity of the returns of the electoral votes, or the right of the persons who gave the votes, or the manner or the circumstance in which they ought to be counted. It seems to have been taken for granted that no question could ever arise on the subject, and that nothing more was necessary than to open the certificates, which were produced in the presence of both Houses, and to count the number and names as returned.

The precedent established by the first Congress, as I have quoted it, and the opinions of the two learned commentators cited, are even-tempered and wholly non-partisan. No men were more careful in giving expression to opinions relative to the true meaning of the Constitution than those who gave it form and participated in its adoption. They were fresh from their labors when the first precedent was established, and no commentators on our Constitution have been more scrupulously careful than Kent and Story. When such authorities all concur we will not go widely wrong by accepting their conclusions.

It may be said that Kent intimates that legislation may be enacted relative to the counting of the electoral votes, inasmuch as he says in the quotation I have made from him that—

I presume in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result.

But he could not have meant by this that a power vested by the Constitution could be divested by legislative action. The most that can be claimed from this expression is, when taken in connection with his suggestion relative to questionable votes and a closely contested election, that he saw in the existing provision of our Constitution a danger point in our system. In this view I can agree, and I would be glad to have a change of the Constitution in this regard effected, but this can not be reached by an act of Congress. And if, in response to this statement, it be asked, Have the Senate and House of Representatives no power whatever in the premises, and can they not legislate on the subject? my answer is, To regulate the exercise of the power, yes; to abridge it, no. Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution says that Congress shall have power—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

Here is a delegation of power to provide for carrying into effect the power to open and count the votes of the electors lodged in the President of the Senate. But it does not confer on Congress the power to assume unto itself the duty which the Constitution imposes on that officer. The Constitution says that—

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

But Congress must "make all laws which may be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" this power. And of another great power the Constitution says:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time establish.

This power is to be provided for in the matter of its execution by necessary and proper legislation enacted by Congress. But in neither case can Congress take upon itself any of the power granted to the executive and judicial departments of the Government; nor can Congress by neglecting to legislate draw unto itself any part of these powers, or of the power conferred by the Constitution on any officer of the Government. If Congress had failed to make laws necessary and proper for carrying into effect the executive power, would such failure divest the President of that power or relieve him from his obligation to execute it as best he may in the absence of legislation? Certainly not; for this would lead to the disintegration of the Government. The President would have great difficulty in the execution of his office in the absence of legislation providing for its administration, and in many respects he could not act at all; but the executive power would still be his. Nor can he be divested of any part of his power by legislation. Neither action nor inaction by Congress can change the constitutional lodgment of executive power from the President to itself, or to any other department or officer of the Government. And the same observation applies to the judicial power and to every other power, whether vested in a department or officer of the Government. And it applies with as much force to the power given to the President of the Senate to open and count the electoral votes cast for President and Vice-President as to any other power or duty defined by the Constitution.

Mr. President, the Constitution provides in the matter of the election of President and Vice-President that—

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

The electors may, under this provision, be appointed by the Legislature itself, or that department of the State government may, unless prohibited by its own constitution, provide for the election of electors by general ticket, or by districts, or a part by one mode and a part by some other. The entire matter of the appointment or election of the electors is committed to the several States. When so appointed or elected, the duties of electors are prescribed by the Constitution. Congress has no power over the appointment of the electors, nor has it any to interfere with their constitutionally prescribed duties. The duties thus protected against Congressional or other interference are to vote, list their votes, sign and certify the lists of votes, and transmit them sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; and when they have discharged these duties, there is nothing more to be done in the matter of the election of a President but to open and count the votes thus listed, certified, and returned in manner prescribed by the Constitution, and that is, in my judgment, to be done by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, unless it appears from the count so made that the electors have failed to elect a President by a majority of their votes so cast, returned, open, and counted. In case of such failure, and—

If no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, a President. * * * And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President.

And a failure of the electors to elect a Vice-President confers, under the Constitution, the power on the Senate to elect that officer. Can we conclude that the framers of our Constitution, when they conferred on the respective Houses of Congress these extraordinary powers, intended to invest them with the still more extraordinary power of rejecting the votes of electors appointed by the several States, and thereby creating by themselves and for themselves the contingency which alone gives them the right and power to elect a President and Vice-President? The mere statement of such a proposition is its own refutation. And if no such power rests with the two Houses for concurrent action, how much more preposterous does it seem to be to claim that it rests with either House alone, and especially with the House of Representatives, with which body the power to elect a President abides in the event of a failure of the electors to elect?

Such a doctrine would stand as a perpetual menace to the peace of this country. It would establish an ever-present temptation to Congress to intermeddle with the elections of Presidents. When the framers of the Constitution expressly prohibited Senators and Representatives from appointment as electors, they clearly indicated their purpose to exclude them from all power in or over the matter of the election of a President by the electors appointed by the States. This was the understanding which the members of the First Congress had of the Constitution, as is evidenced by their proceedings in the ascertainment of the result of the first Presidential election. For a long period of time the practice then adopted was followed without substantial change. All through the period when the minds most active in the formation of our Constitution, and those of forceful action in the early affairs of our governmental movements, controlled or influenced Congress with respect to the ascertainment of the results of Presidential elections, the precedent of the First Congress was in all substantial respects followed. Our Constitution in this regard may not be in the best form. But we can not change it by an act of Congress, nor by such act confer power on Congress not given by the Constitution.

It is no new thing to find that our Constitution needs amendment. Fifteen articles of amendments testify to this fact. If we have discovered a defect in the respect of which the pending bill treats, it were better for us to do what has been done fifteen times heretofore, provide for an amendment of the Constitution in manner and form as it points out, rather than resort to the doubtful expedient now before us.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, there is a great deal of force in what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has said with reference to the precedents of the early fathers of the Republic and the founders of the Constitution. The question I believe has been very thoroughly discussed from time to time in the various debates upon the subject during the last fifteen years, and notably it was fully discussed in 1876 and 1877. If this is a plain provision of the Constitution, no one I suppose will deny the proposition of the Senator from Iowa that Congress can not change it. It must be admitted if the Constitution of the United States has provided for the whole subject, there it must be left.

It is apparent that the fathers of the Constitution, at least those who sat in the first Congresses, did not think that the Constitution was self-executing so far as not to require any legislation, because in 1792 they legislated upon this subject. Some of the provisions are in the present statute. For instance:

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet.

That provision has been continued to the present day, and it is continued in substance in this bill. In 1804 Congress, under the new twelfth amendment to the Constitution, again legislated on this subject, and my attention was called by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] a few moments ago to the difference in phraseology of the two acts. In 1804 the statute was made to read as follows:

But those certificates only of votes given for President and Vice-President of the United States shall be opened by the President of the Senate, for the purpose of being counted, which shall contain the list or lists of votes given in conformity with the Constitution, as in force on the day fixed by law for the meeting of the electors, by whom the said votes shall have been given.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever, by the provisions of the second section of this act, it shall be the duty of the electors for any State to vote in conformity, both with the Constitution and of the proposed amendment thereto, the executive authority of such State shall cause six lists of the names of the electors for the State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the said electors on or before the day fixed by law for them to meet and vote for President and Vice-President, and the said electors shall inclose one of the said lists in each of the certificates by them made and sealed, in conformity with the provisions of this act and of the act to which this is a supplement.

The authority, or rather the command, if command can be made upon the State executive by Congress, still exists that they shall make these certificates. I need not go into any details as to how the certificates reach the presiding officer of the Senate. The fathers of the Republic assumed in the Constitution and in the subsequent legislation that there would be but one set of returns, that the officer who had the duty imposed upon him of opening and counting, if it is to be insisted upon that he was to count, had only to tabulate the vote. Later it was discovered that controversies might arise. We all recollect that in 1876 from three different States at least, if not from more, there were duplicate certificates presented to the presiding officer. In one State the governor had certified to the appointment of two electors of one political faith and one of another. From two States different officers claiming to be the executive officers of the State had certified different lists of electors to the presiding officer of the Senate. So there were presented both phases of trouble. Here was a governor who assumed to declare for the State who were its electors. That presented one question to be examined, and a different question from that of a dual State government. Then came from South Carolina and Louisiana duplicate certificates presenting different electors, signed by different officers and represented by a different State government.

The question presented in 1877 to the Senate was whether the presiding officer of this body could determine for himself, with the two bodies looking on, incompetent to challenge the correctness of his verdict, who were the electors of the State of Louisiana, who were the electors of the State of South Carolina, or who were the electors of Oregon. Not a very strong argument can be drawn from the condition of the public mind at that time, but it is morally certain that the two Houses would not have sat here in joint convention and allowed the then Senator from Michigan, who was the presiding officer, to count that vote and determine for them who were the electors from Louisana and who were the electors from South Carolina. We had reached a point in the construction of the Constitution when it was morally impossible to have it construed in that way without bringing on anarchy, bloodshed, and war. I believe on that occasion the then presiding officer was of the opinion (in fact I may say I know he was of the opinion) that the power existed with him, if he saw fit to exercise it, to determine between the votes sent up from Florida, South Carolina, and Louisiana, which was and which was not the vote of each State.

Mr. HOAR. In the absence of an agreement of the two Houses.

Mr. TELLER. In the absence, of course, of an agreement of the two Houses. But in this body there were only found seventeen men who were in favor of leaving the question without legislation. All who opposed the bill, which was called the electoral commission bill, mustered in the Senate only seventeen. Some opposed it upon one ground and some upon another, but the great majority of the Senate then expressed their opinion that that power was not lodged in the presiding officer of the Senate, because if it was lodged there by the Constitution they had not the power to take it away, yet they voted that they would take it away and intrust it to a tribunal to be established by an act of Congress.

There has been, then, upon this question at the most important political period of our history a legislative construction of both branches of Congress with great unanimity, and I do not think it is worth while now to discuss the existence of the power in the presiding officer of the Senate to count the votes. I heard a Senator rise and express his astonishment that it should be proposed to leave to the governor of a State the opportunity, as he said, of determining for himself, to the exclusion of the will of the State, what was the vote of the State. Much less ought it to be left to a man who is not responsible at all to the State that he is perhaps ready to disfranchise, a State to which he is not responsible in any manner or form, unless it is plainly provided in the Constitution that that power shall there be lodged.

No very potent and powerful argument can be drawn from the act of the first joint convention, because there were none of these grave questions then presenting themselves, any more than there were in February last when the presiding officer of the Senate announced to this body that he would decline to settle any controversy if controversies had arisen. No controversy did arise; no controversies may arise; we may go on as we have for years to come, yet we recollect that in 1856 a controversy arose that under some circumstances might have caused difficulty, which fortunately, however, it did not. I think, without going into any extensive discussion of the case, it must be assumed that we have reached a point in our history now where legislation is demanded by the judgment of both Houses of Congress and demanded by the judgment of the country.

For fifteen years at least this matter has been presented to the public, and if there ever was very much of a theory among the people that the presiding officer of the Senate could act judicially and determine who were and who were not the electors in a controversy, I believe that has at last been done away with. The electoral system proceeds upon the theory that the State is to be heard. It is the States that elect the President of the United States, and not the people of the States nor the people of the General Government. By a departure from the original idea we have, it is true, adopted a system of nominating the candidates in a national convention and putting their names at the heads of our tickets and apparently electing them by a popular vote; and we sometimes say that such a President lacked a majority of the popular vote, as if the popular vote was at all necessary to his success or to his credit when he sits in the Presidential chair.

It is the action of the States, and so careful were the fathers of the Republic to protect the States, that when by an accident or by any circumstance the election does not take place they empowered the House of Representatives to elect a President, and then they limited the votes to the number of States. Delaware with its one Representative stands equal in all respects in the House of Representatives in that kind of a contest with New York with its thirty-four Representatives. New York and Delaware vote equally in every respect when a President is elected by the House.

Now, the only thing to be determined is what is the vote of the State. When the Constitution has, ex industria, put everywhere the idea that the State is to be heard and the State only, to say we may not legislate in such a way as to aid in carrying out that idea is to assert that the Constitution is self-interpreting and self-enforcing, which it is not, as we all know, in scarcely any of its provisions.

The States must be heard, and I deny the right of either House, or both Houses of Congress, acting together or acting separately, to disfranchise a State when the State shall have sent its vote here in accordance with law. Under the bill a State may provide a tribunal that may inquire into any controversy that arises in the State. If the State fails so to do, let the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts be adopted; and then the governor is the ultimate tribunal whom we have declared we will recognize, and the only tribunal we will recognize as determining the question what is or what is not the vote of the State.

Where can you leave that, in the absence of a judicial inquiry, better than with the governor of a State? I know in times of high partisan excitement there may be danger that the governor of a State will outrage the people of his State by not expresssng the voice that they have expressed at the polls; but it is much safer to leave it with him, who is answerable to the people for any outrage he may commit, than to intrust it to hands foreign to the State and having no connection with the State.

It was said here the other day by a number of Senators that they would be glad to see the Supreme Court of the United States intrusted with this power. I deny the right of the General Government to settle this question by the Supreme Court. It is the action of the State, and the State has not consented and does not consent that a tribunal foreign to it shall determine that question. It will determine the question for itself, and when it has determined it there is not a power anywhere to interfere with that action of the State.

Mr. President, the bill is not perfect. The bill may have provisions that I do not quite like. The only thing it lacks is that it does not recognize quite to the full extent I desire the power and control of the State. But there may be, and possibly will be, times when it may be necessary to determine what the State has settled, or rather, to put it more properly, to determine which is the State, whether it is the people who come here represented by one man as governor or another, when there is a dual State government. It is then, and then only, under the bill as I understand, when it shall have been properly amended as proposed, that there can be any inquiry at all; and because the bill transmits, and remits, and leaves with the State so much and so fully this question, I am in favor of it.

It was said here the other day that it would be better for the two Houses to join together and that the numerical vote should be united, and that the majority, Senators counting as Representatives and Representatives as Senators, should determine all questions of this kind. That is to abandon the whole electoral theory, in my judgment. It is to abandon the whole theory of our Government that the States are to participate in this election as States and not as a portion of the American people in general convention met. The State of New York, with its great vote, would outvote nine of the smaller States who stand upon this floor with eighteen Senators, and a very large control at least of this body would sink into oblivion, I may say, when they were joined in with the four hundred and one that would compose the joint convention, and, as was said a day or two ago, with the five hundred who must soon be put into the other Chamber with the admission of new States and the increase of population.

The whole electoral theory, I wish to repeat, goes upon the idea that the State is to be heard, and all talk about remitting this question to outside tribunals, whether the Supreme Court or any other body, is a departure from the true spirit of the Constitution. The real and potent and urgent objection made to the tribunal of 1877 was that it remitted to a tribunal outside of a State the questions that ought to be settled in the State.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, it seems to me that the bill has some very great merits and also some defects. The twelfth article of amendment of the Constitution provides that:

> The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves, and they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each, which list they shall sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed.

It is quite evident that there are questions raised by these several statements of the Constitution. What certificates shall be counted? The certificates of the electors chosen by the States, electors who shall not be Senators or Representatives or holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. These are all questions which must be decided by some one. Who is that to be? The Constitution does not declare. It says "the votes shall then be counted," and yet what are and what are not votes depends upon the decision of who are the electors, who are persons not holding offices of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. This act of judgment is an act of election, and upon it depends who is the President of the United States.

It is quite manifest that there must be some decision by some authority. It is insisted by the argument of some Senators that it inheres in the authority of the President of the Senate to open the certificates. But that question must be decided not by an inference, but by the genius and spirit of our institutions. It must be affirmed that it is more consistent with the theory of government established in the Constitution that one person shall absolutely decide this question than that the representatives of the people shall do it, than that the two Houses of Congress shall do it. That is the affirmation alone upon which this exercise of power by the President of the Senate can be justified. It is by the argument, if true, that the decision by one person as to who shall be the President and Vice-President of the United States is more in accordance with the theory of a popular representative government than a decision by the representatives of the people themselves.

But the argument fails in another respect. The Constitution provides that the House of Representatives, acting by States, shall, in the contingency that no person has received a majority of votes, elect the President of the United States by States. Here, as was affirmed by the honorable Senator from Ohio the other day, rests I think a great determining fact in the argument. It is proposed to remit the decision to a tribunal not vested with power, as is the argument in favor of the President of the Senate by inference, from the fact of his having the votes in his hands and being required to count such votes as have been properly cast, for that is the inference; and the certificates, it is said, come to the President of the Senate; no certificates shall be counted but those of the electors, and he opens them, and the choice of opening them rests in his hands. But the argument in favor of the House of Representatives is that the Constitution vests in them the power of making an election, not when the President of the Senate, or the Senate, or the two Houses shall declare that an election has failed, but when the fact is that it has failed, no matter who has declared or certified to the contrary.

The argument which is made to vest this power in the President of the Senate, that it carries with it the function of judgment and deciding when it is to be exercised, manifestly vests it in the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives are to perform a constitutional act. When? Not when everybody has declared and certified that they shall do it, but when an election has failed for the want of a majority of votes, let the certificates be as they may. In that contingency, both by the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, that function is to be exercised.

Now, the bill provides for the exercise of this act of judgment, which act of judgment is an election, and provides, I think, wisely for it, but it meets with this difficulty: The power of excluding the vote of a State, of sitting in judgment upon it, is vested in the two Houses. The vote of a State shall not be rejected without the concurrence of the two Houses. Where there is a question and an objection, the vote shall not be counted without the concurrence of the two Houses. This is vesting the absolute power of election in the discretion of either House in the contingency where the vote of a State not counted would make the election of a different person, would constitute a majority of the whole number, or its withdrawal would prevent an election.

There can be no question that by this act of judgment which requires the concurrence of both Houses, in the contingency where there is not an election if the vote be not counted, you vest the power absolutely of making an election, not in the House of Representatives, the constitutional body provided and vested with that power, but in either House of Congress choosing to object to the counting of that vote, for it can not be counted without the concurrence of both.

The bill I think a wise one in its main provisions, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who reports it, and has defended it with ability, is entitled to high commendation for it.

But I think that in the respect mentioned there is a defect in this proposed law. The act of judgment of this body changes the power of the House of Representatives, if it were law and possible to do it. It assumes the power to do it. It changes the power of that body and restricts it by a bare majority from exercising the right to make an election in their judgment and discretion.

Mr. President, I do not know that it will affect the result at all, for I have observed that when a committee reports a bill it is very difficult and but rarely the case that in any of its essential and important provisions a change can be made without the approval of the committee; but it seems to me that the bill should be amended, and I had prepared an amendment to the effect that when by this exercise of judgment by the two Houses, by this non-concurrence of the two Houses, by this objection on the part of either House to the counting of the vote of a State, the majority required by the Constitution of the whole number was taken away, or when by not counting the vote of the State an election of a different person than that who would be elected if the vote were counted should be had—in those two contingencies it shall be declared that there was no election, and the House of Representatives shall make the election as required by the Constitution. It has been urged in objection to that that it would be an invitation, placing it in the power of the House of Representatives to bring about that result; but the bill does that already. It is by the bill in the power of either House in the contingency mentioned. Wherever the failure to count the vote of a State would prevent a majority of the whole number from being cast, the bill lets either House non-concurring bring about the result.

Then what tribunal is so appropriate to make the election as that tribunal which by the Constitution is vested with the power to decide when a majority of the whole number of votes has or has not been cast, for it is evidently without limitation in the Constitution that that body is to exercise the power, and, exercising the power, can do it only upon its own motion, its own sovereign legislative power vested in it by the Constitution. It alone can decide for itself. The Senate might decide that a majority of the whole number of votes has not been cast, the President of the Senate might so decide, the Supreme Court might so decide, but by the nature of the sovereign power vested in the popular branch of Congress, the House of Representatives, by the very theory of legislative government and independence in the two Houses—the House alone can decide and act upon its own decision that a majority of the whole number of votes has not been cast.

I think I shall vote for the bill as it stands, because it refers it to the States to decide for themselves who are chosen electors, and gives to the two Houses the right and duty only of deciding that the State has decided who are chosen, but I think the bill would be greatly improved by the amendment I propose.

What tribunal, then, so appropriate in respect to the character of our Government as the members of the House of Representatives, elected by the people, voting as States and not by numerical majority? What tribunal other than the House of Representatives can in accordance with the whole spirit and genius of representative government make that decision and act when the failure to count the vote of a State, however proper and wise and justified by circumstance it may be, will produce the contingency mentioned in the Constitution, the failure to obtain a majority of the whole number of votes cast or make an election where there was none?

I do not know that it is in order for me now to offer the amendment, as I understand that the bill stands upon a motion to recommit it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the recommitment of the bill to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HOAR. I wish simply to point out to the Senate that a vote to recommit the bill is a vote against legislation on the subject. No Senator who has any experience in this body will doubt the truth of what I say, that the bill is in as good a situation for action by the Senate itself as any measure that has come before it in recent years or as any measure that can come before it. I suppose it is unquestionably true, as the history of our recent legislation will show, that any large public measure likely to excite considerable diversity of opinion and considerable debate, which is reported in either House after the 1st of March, at the first session of any Congress, has not one chance in twenty of passing through both Houses by the end of the second session of that Congress.

As suggested by my honorable friend from New York, here is a bill not only having had the advantage three times of full discussion in the Senate itself, not only having had the advantage more than three times of being carefully matured and considered in committees heretofore, but referred to a committee of which my honorable friend and, I think, my honorable friend from Ohio who sits in the chair also at the time the bill was considered and reported, were both members. Having the fullest opportunity there to suggest their constitutional difficulties and constitutional arguments and propose amendments, the bill goes through the committee without any suggestion from any quarter, and it stands upon the docket of the Senate for six or eight weeks, its provisions well known to the whole body and attracting public interest, and now has been for six or eight days—I do not remember the exact number—before the Senate for debate, laid aside once or twice that other measures might be taken up and considered.

It is true, as happens I suppose in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred of bills of any importance, one amendment has been suggested in the Senate besides that amendment, which suggests a wholly different scheme, offered by the present occupant of the chair—one amendment by the friends of the bill—but certainly if such an occurrence could be regarded as a ground for recommitting a bill, we never should reach any point of practical legislation.

Now, I wish to say one word upon the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from New York. He thinks that there should be added to the bill a provision for a certificate made in advance of the vote by the electors of a State from the executive or other State authority sent here of the number of electors appointed and the persons I suppose whom that officer finds to be appointed—the act of the State.

Mr. EVARTS. And of all the votes cast.

Mr. HOAR. And of all the votes cast in the canvass. It seems to me that one sufficient answer to that suggestion is that it is a departure, a clear and fundamental departure, from the method provided and devised by the Constitution itself. If that certificate is a certificate upon which the counting power, wherever it may be lodged, is to act, by which it is to be in any respect governed or guided or aided in declaring the result of a Presidential election, it is in conflict, if not with the letter, certainly with the spirit and design, of the Constitution itself; for whatever may be left in obscurity, it is most clearly expressed there that the certificates upon which the body, the counting power, is to act, are to be made up by the persons acting rightfully, or claiming to act rightfully, as electors, and kept sealed, kept from the public view, from the time of the electoral vote until they are to be opened and laid before the body by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses.

These certificates "they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate." The President of the Senate is prohibited even from opening them, or from having any official knowledge of their contents, until in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives he is to open them, "and the votes shall then be counted." It is manifest, as it seems to me, that the constitutional purpose was that the action of the counting power should be upon the certificates sealed up till that time and then opened and laid before them, communicated by the President of the Senate.

Practically, of course, if it is desired, whenever the two Houses, or any other public officer, act upon this question, such preparation for that action as may be deemed necessary will be easy enough without this formal forwarding of the certificate from the executive or other public officer of the State. Of course the public know who claim to be electors; they know if there is a contest between two bodies in a State; they know what body the governor has certified; they know how that body of electors has voted; and the whole thing is practically, for all purposes of preparation or investigation or study, in the knowledge of any public officer or of either House of Congress who have to act upon the subject.

So I do not see myself the advantage of recommitting to the committee this bill for the purpose of seeing whether such a provision may be ingrafted upon it, but I should rather prefer that the Senator from New York would prepare his amendment and submit it in the Senate. The Senators are constitutional lawyers, and can deal with such a question as they do with other questions much more difficult than this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EVARTS. My friend the Senator from Massachusetts has seemed to think that the public knowledge which grows out of the publicity of elections is a basis that can at least instruct the minds of the two Houses of Congress when they are called upon to determine as to who are the appointed electors and who are not. My desire is that the distinct and authentic action of the State should be directed to that particular point as distinguishable from the voting act of the electors themselves. Nor, I am persuaded, will a careful attention to the text of the Constitution show that this inspection of the result of the elections in appointing electors is a departure from any of the pursuit that has heretofore followed only a scrutiny of the votes themselves.

My objection is, that being entitled to know what has been the result of an election appointing electors as soon as it may be after it is completed, and entirely unconnected with the question how they will vote, entirely unconnected with the question how, when their votes are compared with the votes that the electors of other States have cast, the result will be affected, we shall have this deliberate collective electoral college certified to us in the most deliberate form not only of a governor's conclusion, but of his certificate to us as to how the final act of the State has shown itself in the canvass of the votes.

Mr. President, I deprecated entirely any disposition to delay the consideration of the bill. I do not myself see why the Committee on Privileges and Elections may not have an opportunity at a single session or at a session embraced within a week to dispose of these amendments which are now suggested and which are recognized, as I suppose, as important amendments. I do not know whether it is in order, but I have sent up to the Secretary of the Senate a proposed amendment which I have draughted since I came into the Senate Chamber, and if it may now be properly read as a part of the information which is presented with my observations, I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Add as a new section:

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State, as soon as practicable after the conclusion of the appointment of electors in such State by the final ascertainment, under and in pursuance of the laws of such State providing for such ascertainment, to communicate under the seal of State to the Secretary of State of the United States a certificate of the result of such ascertainment of the electors appointed, setting forth the names of such electors and the canvass or other ascertainment under the laws of such State of the number of votes given or cast for each person for whose appointment any and all votes have been given or cast. And it shall also, thereupon, be the duty of the executive of each State to deliver to the electors of such State the same certificate in triplicate under the seal of the State, and such certificates shall be inclosed and transmitted by the electors with and at the same time and in the same manner as is provided by law for transmitting by such electors to the seat of Government the lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice-President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not now in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe the pending question is on the motion to recommit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the pending motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say, Mr. President, that I do not see in respect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York any necessity of a recommittal. The amendment is entirely apart from the difficult aspects of the subject, and that is how to bring the thing down to the nearest point of a final conclusion between two canvassing boards of votes.

This amendment, as it now strikes me, is one that I should entirely favor in substance. I should rather prefer that this certificate from the governor of the State should be sent to the President of the Senate, to whom the electoral votes are to be sent, which is a mere matter of method of course, than be sent to the Secretary of State; and I should prefer to have added to my friend's amendment a provision that this certificate should be opened by the President of the Senate and kept on public file so that every Senator and every member of the House of Representatives, both of whom are in the end to take into consideration in some way and for some effect all these things, should have access to it at all times, so that the two Houses of Congress would be informed as to who it appeared from this certificate of the governor had been elected electors in the particular State and in all the States and who it appeared if a tribunal in that State—which is the great security, after all—had decided, if there was any doubt or dispute, was the true electoral college of that State. That would enable the two Houses of Congress to be advised in advance of the state of the official circumstances that had taken place in that State.

So, as it strikes me now, I think the idea is an extremely valuable one, but I do not see that it would be necessary to create the delay which would necessarily follow from a recommittal to send the bill back to the committee in order that such an amendment might be framed, because the amendment even in my view is almost perfect as it now stands. I hope, therefore, that the bill will not be recommitted. All the other aspects of the question have been discussed and discussed and rediscussed over and over again, and every Senator is just as well prepared to state his conclusion in his vote on the present occasion—I do not mean at this moment, but while the matter is under discussion—as he could be after a recommittal and a rereport by the committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections I consented to the bill being reported to the Senate for the purpose of its being considered, and not because the provisions of the bill commended themselves to me very strongly. I believe I have been a member of that committee for eight or ten years, and we have several times had this very question before the committee and every time the difficulty seemed to be irremovable.

It strikes me that the bill of the committee does invite action on the part of the governor of a State, who knows the politics of the courts of the State to whom the question is to be submitted, which may lead to trouble. It may invite contest and objection before the courts. So it seems to me the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, the present occupant of the chair, invites antagonism by the House of Representatives in order that they may control. I should be glad, therefore, to see if the committee can devise a plan that will remove these difficulties out of our road. I am not certain that it can be done. I confess that I can at present see no way whereby we can relieve this question from embarrassment, but we ought to do the very best we can. A little delay will not hurt the matter; on the contrary, it may aid it. I shall, therefore, though I am a member of the committee from which the bill was reported, vote to refer the bill back to the committee to see if, upon further reflection and further deliberation, we can not devise some means that may at any rate remove as far as possible the difficulties in the case.

I should like to vote for a bill which has come from a committee of which I am a member; but my honest conviction is that this bill is not in the shape it ought to be, neither would it be exactly in the shape it ought to be if the amendment of the Senator from Ohio was adopted. I therefore hope that the bill with all these amendments will go to the committee to see if they can not devise some plan to relieve the question of its present embarrassments.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York and the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida may be considered as pending and may be printed, so that if this bill should be recommitted these proposed amendments may go with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has not sent up his amendment.

Mr. CALL. I will send it up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the amendments proposed by the Senator from Florida and the Senator from New York be considered as pending and that they be printed. If there is no objection that order will be made.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I shall vote for the motion to refer. As a member of the committee that reported the bill I was unable to give my assent to it. I had difficulties in committee which were not removed by the discussions there. I have listened very carefully and attentively to the very able and instructive discussion in the Senate, and I confess that the difficulties which I had have not been removed. There are some questions involved in the bill that I should like to have considered in committee more deliberately and more carefully than they have been. The main question which I should like to have considered, and which was not considered at all in the committee, is raised by the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio who now occupies the chair. I have given the matter of that amendment as careful consideration as I am capable of, and while I have reached no conclusion which I am willing to stand by without further consideration, I am bound to say that the inclination of my mind is that the constitutional mode, the mode prescribed in the Constitution itself for determining all questions connected with the counting of the votes, is the joint assemblage of the two Houses of Congress, in whose presence the Constitution requires the count to be made.

I have listened very carefully to the arguments urged against that view, but they have not removed the inclination which exists in my mind to the conclusion that this joint body, the Senate and House of Representatives, called together in pursuance of the Constitution itself, is the body which the Constitution intended to supervise, control the count, and decide all questions connected with it. I have not been able to see what office or what function this joint body performs unless that function is accorded to it. Certainly the Constitution of the United States would not contain a provision providing—and that is the only instance in which it does provide for anything of that sort—for the extraordinary thing of convening the two Houses together with no function devolved upon them to perform. Certainly, sir, it appears to me that they were not by the Constitution summoned together as mere spectators; and accordingly any theory that may be propounded which denies to them, thus assembled together, the power to adjudicate upon all questions that may be raised with reference to the count is unreasonable. Their assemblage together is otherwise of no force whatever.

It will not do to say that they come together as witnesses merely. In one sense they are witnesses; in the sense that I may say or any one may say that he witnesses fireworks or any other transaction; but in a legal and constitutional sense, being called together for the purpose of attesting a fact, there is no mode in which the two Houses can attest anything.

Then again, Mr. President, the legal idea of a witness is that he is to be called upon before some legal court to give testimony in relation to a fact. If we come here under this clause of the Constitution and merely look at what is being done by other persons, if we have no jurisdiction, if we have no power to settle anything or to do anything, then there is no tribunal before which these two bodies can give any testimony in relation to any fact that may transpire here.

I am led further to conclude that that is possibly the correct construction of the Constitution by this fact. The Constitution certainly intended that the electoral votes should be counted. It did not intend that a part of them should be rejected on account of a difference between any persons connected with the counting. The command of the Constitution is that "the votes shall then be counted." If the duty of ascertaining what votes are to be counted is to be referred to the separate action of each one of the two Houses of Congress, it may result, and probably will result, in no determination at all. The Senate may affirm that one set of electors are elected; the House may affirm that another set are elected. Under that view, then, there is no determination, no settlement of the important and essential fact as to what particular votes from any particular State shall be counted. The settlement of that question is judicial in its nature; it is not legislative. It is the ascertainment of what the law is and of what the fact is.

The office of a legislator is to determine what shall be, it is to make a rule for future action. The office of a court is to determine whether a certain fact exists.

It being thus, I think, very clearly shown that whoever does determine what votes shall be counted performs a judicial act, then I say it is a solecism in legal language, it is a constitutional absurdity, to assert that the Constitution has organized for the determination of a fact, an essential fact, too, for the operation of the Government, two distinct bodies, which may and probably will never agree about the matter. It is not known, so far as my observation extends, that any court has been organized for the purpose of determining a fact, or I might put it in another way, that two courts have been organized for the purpose of ascertaining the same fact. It is not like the case of a simple court, composed of an even number of persons, who may divide equally, because there at least the members of that court have the opportunity of consultation, of argument, and of discussion with each other; but here, under the theory of this bill, if the two Houses, each acting separately for itself, are to determine the question, then we have this, I say, unprecedented and unparalleled fact in Anglo-Saxon usage, that on a grave question involving the peace of the country, a question which must be settled, which can not be evaded or postponed, which must be settled in some way, the framers of the Constitution have so ordained and provided that that question may not by any possibility ever be decided.

Now, sir, for the purpose of having these questions and some others connected with this matter more deliberately and more carefully considered, and not for the purpose, as my friend from Massachusetts appears to think, of postponing or of preventing any action by this Congress on this subject during the present session, I shall vote to recommit the bill and pending amendments to the proper committee.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I think it is to be regretted that members of the committee did not ascertain when they brought in this bill that they did not understand it. We might thereby have saved ourselves a great deal of trouble and time in debating it. Three members of this committee have avowed on the floor that they are very undecided about the bill which has been reported here. There being no dissenting report, no adverse report on the bill, I had taken it for granted that the bill came with the approval of the entire committee; but it seems to be otherwise.

I believe the Senate is now prepared to vote on this bill, notwithstanding some members of the committee have not made up their minds, and for that reason I am opposed to its being recommitted. We have had the subject under debate here for years and years together. It came into the Senate very soon after I had the honor of appearing here, and it has been a topic of debate at almost every session of Congress from that time to this, and I doubt the ability of any gentleman on this floor to add any new light, whether drawn from history, from experience, from logic, reasoning, or from any other source, upon the subject; and I hope that the committee will allow the Senate to vote upon the bill. After they have taken it back, I do know that they are going to resolve their doubts in the committee-room. Debate can progress here until the doubts of these gentlemen on the committee are resolved, or if not resolved they can decline to vote. I believe the Senate ought to make progress with this bill and act upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish at this time to submit a single observation in reply to my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. I would not wish his persuasive argument in favor of the two Houses, or the members of the two Houses as I understand him to mean, consolidated, acting in a judicial capacity upon a question of this kind, to go without a word of reply.

The Constitution of the United States declares in emphatic and unmistakable language that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish;" so that it seems to be clear, if language is worth anything in the Constitution of our fathers, that the makers of the Constitution did not intend to repose either in the executive department or in the two Houses of Congress any judicial power, except as you might say when each House considers the election of its members or where it is authorized to consider the conduct of its members and expel them, where they act in a certain sense in a judicial capacity and except in respect of the judicial aspect in which the Senate acts on the trial of impeachments. Those are special exceptions, special clauses specially named, so that it seems to be a clear inference which every lawyer will understand, a conclusive inference, that no judicial power is invested in either or both Houses of Congress that is not especially named and imputed to them as such and in terms.

I agree entirely with my distinguished friend that this act of receiving and counting these votes is not a legislative act, and I say with equal emphasis that, in my opinion, it is not a judicial act, because the Constitution of the United States has not imputed any such judicial power to either or both of the Houses. It is an administrative act, the same sort of administrative act that every State which existed at the time of the formation of the Constitution imputed to its executive and election officers in the canvassing and return of votes and in the final ascertainment of them by some body, for the institution of every officer of a State from a justice of the peace or an overseer of the poor up at least to its governor. In the State of Wisconsin it has been held by its supreme court—I do not remember any other State where the question has been brought into judicial determination—that the final action, in respect of the election of a governor in that State, of whatever authority was appointed by its constitution to take the last steps of canvassing, was not a judicial, but an administrative, action, subject to review, as the rights of every other man are who claims an office there and everywhere in our States, by the judicial tribunals appointed to try judicial contests in a judicial way.

Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us take the vote first.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

Several SENATORS. No; let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, on which motion the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] on all political questions. I hardly understand this to be a political question, and therefore feel at liberty to vote.

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. As I do not know how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DOLPH. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] on political questions. I do not know how he would vote on this bill, and as it may have some political significance, I withhold my vote. I should vote "nay" if I voted at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] on political questions, but I have the consent of his colleague [Mr. KENNA] to vote on this question.

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, so I withdraw my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] is absent, and I have taken the liberty of pairing him with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] with his colleague's consent.

Mr. BLAIR. My colleague [Mr. PIKE] is absent on account of sickness, and I believe is paired.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 22; as follows:

DEATH OF VICE-PRESIDENT HENDRICKS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House has received with profound sorrow the intelligence of the death of Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States.

Resolved, That the business of the House be suspended in order that the eminent public services and the private virtues of the deceased may be appropriately commemorated.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate what I understand to be the regular order of business, the bill for the admission of Dakota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill in regard to Dakota will be stated by its title.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 2, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., as follows:

Almighty God, from whom cometh every good and perfect gift, we reverently bless Thee for the great body of pure and excellent men that have been raised up through Thy providence from generation to generation to serve the State in all the departments of the Government; and as we are met to-day to pay the tribute of our reverent admiration and love for a departed statesman and patriot, noble and beautiful in his public and his private walks by devotion to home, to country, to duty, and to his God, may our own patriotism become stronger and deeper, our love of country more pure and fervent, our love of God more deep and true and tender, and so doing our duty in high or in low places where Thou callest us to act, may we come at last to the reward which Thou hast promised to all who love and serve Thee. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. BEACH. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to bills and resolutions.

There was no objection.

The reading of the Journal was completed and, as read, was approved.

THE LATE VICE-PRESIDENT HENDRICKS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House the remainder of this day is set apart for the consideration of resolutions in relation to the death of the late Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit the resolutions which I send to the desk:

Resolved, That the House has received with profound sorrow the intelligence of the death of Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States.

Resolved, That the business of the House be suspended in order that the eminent public services and the private virtues of the deceased may be appropriately commemorated.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield the floor to the gentleman [Mr. BYNUM] representing the district of Indiana in which the late Vice-President of the United States resided.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, Thomas A. Hendricks, Vice-President of the United States, died suddenly at his home in Indianapolis on the 25th of last November, between the hours of 4 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

On the evening prior to his death he attended a reception at the residence of State Treasurer Cooper, and, though slightly complaining, was the recipient of many congratulations upon his healthful appearance. On this occasion he was exceptionally affable, and participated in the pleasures of the evening with rare grace and extreme joy. Upon his return home he did not rest well and, the next morning the family physician was summoned, who, finding nothing serious the matter, administered an anodyne to relieve the pain of which he complained. No one but himself entertained any thoughts of approaching danger, and the only manifestation of fear upon his part was the gloom of doubt which seemed to be hovering around his mind, causing him to crave the continued presence of Mrs. Hendricks by his side. She was constantly with him on the day of his death until late in the afternoon, when she left him alone, resting comfortably and apparently safely, to receive some friends. She was absent only a few minutes, but when she returned his great spirit was gone.

The news of his death flew fast and far, and, ere the noon of night had passed a feeling of sorrow was in every heart and a shade of sadness upon every brow. Death had not stricken the first-born, yet there was mourning in every household. When the startling news of his death was first communicated to me I was reminded of the time when Burke was making a speech at the hustings in a race for the House of Commons news was brought him of the death of his competitor. Dropping the subject of his speech, he exclaimed: "This teaches us what shadows we are and what shadows we pursue."

Representing in this House the district in which Mr. Hendricks lived from his childhood, and in part—that part nearest and dearest to him by ties of friendship, of kindred, and of home—the district which he represented a third of a century ago, I feel that I would not only fail to discharge a public duty but would be an unworthy exponent of the wishes and sentiments of the people I represent should I fail to assist in embalming the memory of the distinguished dead with the grand achievements of his life in which they so proudly claim to have been participants. He was no ordinary man. He was one of the few great men whose greatness increased and whose grandeur became more sublime the nearer you approached him.

Mr. Hendricks was born in Muskingum County, in the State of Ohio, on the 7th day of September, 1819. His parents the next year removed to Indiana, finally, in 1822, settling in Shelby County, then almost a wilderness, now a garden. It was here upon his father's farm that he spent his youthful days. Here, under the teachings of his noble parents by precept and example, was laid the foundation of that great moral and intellectual structure which he afterwards builded so symmetrically and so grandly. After receiving such an education as the common schools in those primitive days afforded there was kindled in his youthful mind an unquenchable desire for greater knowledge. He entered Hanover College, near Madison, in Jefferson County, and graduated from that institution in 1841. He began the study of the law and was admitted to practice in Shelbyville in 1843. He was married to Miss Eliza C. Morgan in the year 1845, and lived happily with her the remainder of his life, and of whom it has been truly said ever afterward was his Companion, counselor, and friend.

In his profession Mr. Hendricks attained the highest altitude and stood at the head of the bar in Indiana and ranked with the great lawyers of the country. He was not only a jurist of great science, but an advocate of matchless power. He could ably discuss the most intricate questions of law before the highest judicial tribunals and as ably present the facts in a case to a jury gathered fresh from field or shop. In court he was always courteous but dignified, never overstepping the limits of highest decorum. He treated the younger members of the bar with the same consideration as their elders, never attempting to decry their positions or answer their arguments except by sound logic and clear reasoning. During the progress of a trial he closely watched the impressions his adversary would make upon court or jury, and at the first onset would skillfully attempt to parry the blow or fence the thrust. He never permitted himself to be surprised. He always carefully estimated the force of the opposition, and calculated the strength of his own position with a precision that inspired the confidence of his client and gave weight and color to his cause. When engaged in a trial by jury he would ascertain and study the individual history and character of the jurors, and was careful never to antagonize a prejudice, but at every opportunity would say something to captivate their minds until he had gained full possession of their sympathies.

In the order and arrangement of testimony and in the examination of witnesses he was careful and painstaking; in the more dangerous part, the cross-examination, he was cautious, never giving a biased witness an opportunity to injure his cause or stab his client. His arguments were clear and forcible, commending themselves to the soundest judgments; his appeals eloquent, arousing the noblest impulses of the human heart. He was a model that any student of highest ambition might adopt, the bar of any State be proud of, and the courts of any country welcome to its forum.

The great talents he possessed as a lawyer were, however, carried into a higher field and crowned with greater laurels than could be won at the bar. Starting early in life, he gradually arose from an unostentatious beginning to the highest plane of statesmanship.

His public life, running through the most critical period in our history, stands to-day, from beginning to end, without an inconsistency or contradiction.

In 1848 he was elected a member of the Indiana Legislature from Shelby County.

In 1850 he was chosen a member of the constitutional convention which framed the present constitution of that State.

In 1851 he was elected a member of this House and served till 1855.

He was appointed Commissioner of the General Land Office by President Pierce in 1855 and served till 1859, when he resigned.

In 1860 he was the unanimous choice of his party for governor of his State, but was defeated at the election by Henry S. Lane.

In 1862 he was the unanimous choice of his party for United States Senator, and on the 12th of January, 1863, was elected to a seat in that body and served from the 4th of March, 1863, to 1869.

In 1868, although not a candidate, he was supported by the Empire State and came near being nominated by his party in convention at New York for the Presidency. In that year he was again unanimously chosen a candidate for governor, and after a vigorous campaign was defeated by Conrad Baker by a small majority.

In 1872, against his wish, he was again unanimously nominated for governor, and after a hard-fought contest was elected, the balance of the ticket, with one exception, being defeated.

In 1876, without solicitation, the Democratic national convention at Saint Louis with great enthusiasm unanimously nominated him for the Vice-Presidency.

In 1884, against his desire, the Democratic national convention at Chicago again unanimously nominated him for the Vice-Presidency, to which he was elected and inaugurated on the 4th of last March.

He discharged the duties of a legislator in the General Assembly to which he was first elected with care and fidelity. As a member of the constitutional convention he was overshadowed by men of greater experience, but took an active part, always commanding the respect and attention of the members when h espoke. As a member of Congress he began fully to display the inherent powers and great talents which afterward made his name familiar to every household in the land. As Commissioner of the General Land Office, he organized and systematized the departments and instituted reforms, giving abundant proofs of his great executive abilities, which afterward characterized his administration as governor of Indiana. As United States Senator, he rose to the full stature of his country's opportunities and his own duties. No Senator ever stood in the halls of that body who devoted himself with greater diligence, fidelity, and patriotism to the discharge of the high duties of that exalted position than did Mr. Hendricks. During the days of reconstruction contests daily arose that required the greatest efforts of the mightiest intellects.

He was the leader of his party, but facing upon the other side was his colleague, the giant Morton. Both have gone to rest and peacefully sleep upon the beautiful heights of Crown Hill, where the same dewdrops will kiss the flowers that bloom around their graves and the gentle zephyrs waft messages of peace and good-will from mound to mound.

Mr. Hendricks's great strength and popularity were with the people. He never assumed to dictate or even command. During his long public career he never attempted to organize a personal party. His party was the great Democracy, to which he consistently adhered through storm as well as through sunshine; through the disasters of defeat as well as through the fortunes of success. The great principles of Democracy were to him sacred, and he clung to them through all the contests of earth as tenaciously "as the mariner clings to the last plank when the night and the tempest close around him."

His great qualities as a leader can not be overestimated.

He was the great isolated figure around which the Democratic party of the nation rallied during its darkest days and when it looked as though its hour of dissolution was about to come. He was the first Democratic governor elected in a Northern State after the war. His greatest act of leadership, not only of leadership but of statesmanship, was exhibited from 1874 to 1876. In his State in 1874 a young, vigorous, and aggressive party, the Greenback party, began to make serious inroads upon the ranks of the Democracy which he had so successfully preserved intact through all the vicissitudes of the war. There began to spring up a division of sentiment between the great men of his party, and the rank and file began to rally to the support of this or that element until a division looked almost inevitable. Mr. Hendricks possessed the clearest ideas upon questions of finance, but he saw a sentiment, uncontrollable, tearing across the country like a tornado, ready to embrace the crudest plans and most visionary ideas upon this most important question. Standing between the columns he laid a hand upon each and imperceptibly changed their course until they gradually came together, when, at their head, in 1876 he led them up in solid column to the support of Samuel J. Tilden and himself for President and Vice-President of the United States.

He was sometimes criticised for the want of positive ideas, for the want of boldness in the declaration of his principles. No more unjust criticism was ever made. Caution is no more cowardice than rashness is bravery. In counsel he was defiant in the statement of his opinions and supported them with an earnestness and an aggressiveness that not only carried conviction but elicited admiration. He was careful to investigate, but when he once took a position he was as firm as the rock-bound coast against which the waves may dash but rebound to be broken asunder upon the ocean's bosom. When he designated the point of attack and marked out the line of march every recruit was ready to follow him, conscious that no enemy was in ambush upon the line to open a deadly fire upon their flanks.

Mr. Hendricks never declared a proposition he could not defend; never uttered a sentence he was compelled to retract. His courage was once fully tested when an excited populace, following the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, demanded of him that he pledge his support to the administration of Andrew Johnson. He said: "I will support the administration of Andrew Johnson only in so far as I believe it to be within the limits of the Constitution of my country." At the time he thus boldly stated his sentiments he knew that the declaration might cost him his life, and it came near doing so.

Public life with him was not an ambition but a duty. He could stand defeat without the least despondency or the slightest evidence of disappointment; he could stand success without the least assumption or exultation. But few men could alternate from public to private and from private to public life with the ease, grace, and contentment which was evidenced in his career. He could quit his office for a seat in this House or in the Senate seemingly without noticing the change, and at the end of his term could return as contentedly as though he had only been away upon a pleasure trip. Wherever his lot was cast his mind was content and his soul enlisted.

He was an honest man. It is a remarkable fact that in the many high and responsible positions which he filled and the many contests through which he passed suspicion never breathed a calumny against his integrity. He passed through the fiery furnace without a scar, closing an eventful life of an eventful period without a blemish to mar its beauty or destroy its symmetry. His statue, to fitly represent him, should be chiseled of spotless white marble.

Such in brief was the public life of Thomas A. Hendricks, and in many respects it is without a parallel in history. For twenty-five years he was the accepted leader of his party in his State, no one contesting his right or challenging his authority. Three times the unanimous choice of his party for governor; unanimously chosen a candidate for United States Senator; twice unanimously nominated as a candidate for the Vice-Presidency, the cup of his ambition, though he never reached the Presidency, was filled to overflowing. Indiana during her career as a State has given to the country a galaxy of most brilliant men. Among her jurists were Blackford, Dewey, and Sullivan, whose opinions are pre-eminently a part of the jurisprudence of the country. Among her statesmen were Edward A. Hannegan, George G. Dunn, Ashbel P. Willard, Henry S. Lane, and Oliver P. Morton.

The names of these men garnish the pages of history, State and national, and, though sacred in death, it is not improper to say in all that made men great Thomas A. Hendricks will pass into history as the peer of any that preceded him. While he may not have possessed the diction of Hannegan, the fire of Dunn, the magnetism of Willard, the rhetoric of Lane, or the logic of Morton, he combined all these gifts in a high degree, which, coupled with his great moral powers, make him the colossal figure in the history of Indiana and place his name in the list of great men of the greatest nation.

It is not, however, the public life of Mr. Hendricks that is the greatest pride of his neighbors and the highest solace of his family.

In their hours of gloom they recall him not as governor, as Senator, or as Vice-President, but they weep for him as friend, neighbor, brother, and husband. Through his whole life he was a Christian; and although an active and consistent member of the church, his religion was more in acts than in words.

He daily practiced the greatest of all virtues—charity. There are many left behind who to-day miss his generous heart and open hand. All along the pathway of his life are scattered jewels of charity that will finally be gathered home by the angels in eternity. As a neighbor he was always kind, as a friend always true, as a husband he was not only devoted but idolatrous.

His life was great, his death sublime. As he faintly heard the hoofs of the messenger's steed on his way to summon him from time to eternity, and was preparing to start upon his journey beyond the clouds, looking back over his important career, viewing the great struggles through which he had passed and the great contests in which he had borne such a conspicuous part, feeling the weight of the burdens he had so long and so patiently borne being gently lifted from his shoulders, his last words were, "I am free at last."

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, during the last year death gathered into his garner a rich harvest of our able and worthy men, but no one was more loved and respected and none contributed more to embellish American history than the distinguished subject of the resolutions now before the House.

Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States, was born September 7, 1819. Full of years and crowned with civic honors, he died November 25, 1885. The evening before Thanksgiving Day our whole country was startled and sorrow-stricken by the news of his death, and when the Forty-ninth Congress assembled this Capitol was still draped in mourning and the shadow of a great bereavement hovered like a gloomy pall over our country.

He was the fifth Vice-President who died in office, and like George Clinton of New York, Elbridge Gerry of Maine, William R. King of Alabama, and Henry Wilson of Massachusetts, he came to the Vice-Presidency after a long and splendid public career. His life illustrated the possibilities of an American citizen, and came fully up to Blackstone's aphorism, "Act honestly, live honorably, and render to every man his dues." His death was a national calamity, and common sympathy and common sorrow for his loss brought to his countrymen, as they did honor to his memory, irrespective of party or section, truer fellowship and closer friendship.

The great and good men of a nation ennoble it and give character and prominence to it at home and abroad. All their fellow-citizens have a common interest in them, and when they die all love to pay homage to their virtues. The tributes of respect that have been paid to the memory of our late Vice-President in every part of our land; the chaplets without number that have been woven from the flowers of sincerest love and respect; the eulogies that have been spoken in the forum, at the bar, in the Senate, in the sacred church, and in thousands of humble homes and stately mansions prove how thoroughly he is entitled to be ranked among our great and good men.

I first became acquainted with Mr. Hendricks when he was governor of Indiana and I was governor of Kentucky and it became necessary to locate a disputed boundary line between our respective States. In that important business he deported himself with the same fairness and firmness and ability that ever characterized his whole life. I am glad to place on record now that from that time I was his friend and admirer.

Kentucky is only separated from Indiana by the beautiful Ohio River, and Kentuckians gave to Mr. Hendricks the same friendship and admiration that greeted him in his own State. I believe I but speak their sentiments when I say we were proud of him as a leader, counselor, and statesman; we loved him as a neighbor and friend, and we deeply deplore his death.

His political career extended from 1848, when he first entered the Indiana Legislature, nearly to 1886, a period of thirty-eight years of prominence and usefulness in the service of his State and nation. He was a member of the constitutional convention held in Indiana in 1850, and served with Hon. Schuyler Colfax, afterward Vice-President of the United States, and with Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, now a distinguished member of this House, and he was conspicuous in the United States Senate among such Senators as Allen G. Thurman, Thomas F. Bayard, JOHN SHERMAN, and Roscoe Conkling. In 1851 he first entered Congress. No member now on this floor was a member then, but there were many able and brilliant men in Congress. Henry Clay, with his clarion voice and thrilling eloquence; Charles Sumner, with his wisdom and culture and power; Alexander H. Stephens, with his splendid intellect and captivating manners; Salmon P. Chase, with his comprehensive knowledge and indomitable energy, and Stephen A. Douglas, with his logic and courage and great ability, were all then Senators or Representatives in Congress. They are all dead now, but their names are written high on the roll of fame, and they will be remembered and cherished as long as our Republic has a history or freedom a home on earth. To this list will now be added the name of Thomas A. Hendricks, and it will remain as imperishable and honorable as the names of any of the illustrious statesmen with whom he served.

He lived in important and critical times and he acted his part well both in peace and in war. A sketch of his life is a sketch of his country's history for a third of a century.

As a citizen he was broad and benevolent. As a lawyer he was able, faithful, and fearless; and as a political debater his Damascus blade was never vanquished and but seldom parried. The subjects he discussed embraced all the leading questions and political policies of his time. His views on education, commerce, finance, agriculture, an honest, economical administration of the Government, the sovereignty of the people, the independence of the co-ordinate departments of the Government, were often announced in no uncertain terms. Common sense, practical ideas, and conservative opinions were strong features in his statesmanship, and he was ever the friend and advocate of all the great reform measures that have elevated and purified our Republic. Whether we view him as legislator, Commissioner of the General Land Office, Representative in Congress, governor of Indiana, Senator, or Vice-President of the United States, we see the impress of his splendid mind and the luster of his unfaltering patriotism and noble manhood. He was never dazzled by visionary theories nor deluded by speculative projects, but he worked for what he regarded as the good of the people and the welfare of the Republic. In his whole career as citizen, lawyer, and statesman, and even in the heat of fiercest political conflicts, no breath of suspicion ever assailed his integrity or dimmed the brightness of his honor.

No man ever had more of the confidence and affection of the people of his own State than Thomas A. Hendricks. As a candidate for governor he led the Democrats of Indiana to victory in 1872, when every other candidate on the Democratic ticket went down to defeat. The enthusiasm and earnestness with which his Indiana friends supported him for President at the Saint Louis convention in 1876 has never been exceeded, and the thrilling scene in the Chicago convention in 1884, when the attempt was made to nominate him for President, will ever be remembered as positive proof of his great popularity throughout the United States. Nominated in 1876 for Vice-President, he carried his State in a brilliant contest, in which he was opposed by a thoroughly organized party, under the leadership of Oliver P. Morton, the ablest and strongest Republican who ever lived in Indiana; and nominated again for Vice-President in 1884, he again led his party to victory in a canvass that will ever remain memorable in the history of our country.

On the threshold of grand honors and high authority he died, among his kindred and friends, in his own State, at his own home, where he was enjoying the affection of his accomplished and devoted wife. If death can be robbed of his sting; if the pathway to the tomb can be smoothed, surely he went to his grave in "ways of peace and paths of pleasantness."

His friends are preparing to erect a monument to his memory. He needs no monument to perpetuate the blazonry of his deeds, the triumphs of his eventful life, or the beauty and simplicity of his character. "Not all the marble of Carrara, fashioned by the chisel of Angelo into the mimicry of breathing life, can convey to the senses a likeness so perfect as that which he has left on the minds of men." Yet I believe the monument should be erected. It will be an inspiration to this and succeeding generations; it will be an evidence of the love and esteem of his countrymen whom he served so faithfully and on whom he reflected the grandeur of his patriotism and statesmanship, and it will tell the world that he belonged to an honored race, of which he was a chief and a champion.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the loyal Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which I have the honor to represent in part upon this floor, would not have me remain silent when, because I once occupied her executive chair, I am asked by the courtesy of the Representatives of her sister State of Indiana to join in the recognition which the House to-day pays to the memory of the late Vice-President of the United States. Her great majority, Mr. Speaker, differed from him upon all the leading political issues which agitated the country during his public career, and on which they believed his views to be contrary to the public welfare. But they recognize not alone the high abilities which won him distinguished advancement in the profession of the law, of which he was an ornament, and in the councils of his State and the nation, the highest places of which he reached, but also and especially the undoubted consistency of his political life and the excellences and worth which, in his private character, gave him such a remarkably strong hold upon the people of his State, and endeared him, as the spontaneous testimony of members of all political parties shows, to the large and, we may well say, the deserved circle of his personal friends. He was the Vice-President of the East as well as of the West—of Indiana not more than of Massachusetts. And when, soon after his election, he came to that ancient Commonwealth, it was to receive at all hands more generously even than he could have anticipated the distinguished and cordial welcome which was due him in his exalted station; to be invited to the hospitality of her municipalities and of her seats of learning; and to be greeted by the whole body of her intelligent and patriotic people, who stand always ready to support this Republic of indissoluble union and liberty, and who will fail in no obligation to those who have been chosen to administer its high offices.

The life of Mr. Hendricks, sir, illustrates, I believe, not only the splendid opportunities of American manhood, the mastery of circumstance, the attainment by self-exertion of high commanding place. It illustrates all these, and illustrates them signally; yet I love to think it illustrates still more the elastic and admirable adjustability of our national system—its strength residing in its very ease and variety of change. Coming into power as the representative of a party which for a quarter of a century had been out of the executive administration, with what patriotic gratification we all now recall the fact that he encountered no look askance, no sullen defiance, but wherever he went a generous spirit of loyalty, a general readiness to accept the new departure for all it was worth, a consensus of public sentiment in the hope of the public welfare, and a disposition to give the new Administration every facility for the promotion of every good cause. He became the second officer of a reunited Republic which had a few years ago overcome the terrible convulsion that not only for a time rent North and South apart, but also, it should be remembered to-day, strained the North itself in sharp and threatening political divisions of policy and sentiment, of the more unpopular extreme of which he was perhaps the most distinguished representative. And yet to the second place in the administration of that restored Union the revolving wheel of events raised him; and to-day I believe, and we all believe, and the world is acknowledging, that Union is stronger, is more united, aye, is more loyal, Mr. Speaker, because of the discipline of that convulsion and of our magnificent and triumphant mastery of it. Already we realize what history will record—that all's well that is ended well. Over your head, sir, is the flag of a Republic which, in its very storm and peril, brought out leaders and representatives of the variety of opinion referred to by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] and constituting that galaxy of clustering stars in our historical firmament, some names of which he enumerated; a Republic which has thus shown itself to be so happily constituted, so constitutionally systemized, that it plucks the flower of safety out of every nettle of danger. And does this because the freedom which it extends to individuality, though that individuality be unpopular, the freedom which it extends to the right of private judgment, to the expression of honest difference of opinion, to the heated ebullition and therefore the purer distillation of national sentiment—that very freedom results in the one true, sure foundation of a government of the people—which is their education by their mutual attrition up to their duties and their rights. All this, Mr. Speaker, I believe—and it seems to me to be the real significance of this occasion—all this is indicative of what lies deepest in the hearts of the American people and most animates them. The frets, the yest, the whitecaps are always on the surface; and, beaten by them, our tossing craft of local and personal interests seem to be always in storm and in shipwreck. But beneath these, thank Heaven, the deep, unfathomable caves of public opinion, of national loyalty, of popular brotherhood and common interest lie serene and undisturbed. They are an immeasurable fountain of the wholesome waters of life. They are an inexhaustible reservoir of the health of a republic of educated, self-respecting, and equal freemen.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Speaker, representing a people who intelligently appreciated his public services and throughout his career honored and trusted him, Ioffer my humble tribute of admiration to thememory of Thomas A. Hendricks.

We best honor the dead and most benefit the living when we form a just estimate of their characters and lives and accept and apply the instructive and inspiriting lessons which they teach.

Great gifts are the necessary conditions of a great character, but the existence of the former does not always guarantee the possession of the latter; because character, in contradistinction to endowments, represents the fashioning of the latter into distinctive forms. They stand related as the marble block to the perfect statue hewn from it. God gives the one; man himself, by his thought and action, creates the other. As the statue is the concretion of the artistic thought, so a great character must be formed upon a great ideal and be developed in harmony with it. The apt parable used by the great Teacher to illustrate the historical development of the Christian system with equal force teaches the order of human growth, "First the blade, then the ear; after that the full corn in the ear"—inception, development, and maturity.

Life is character in movement—is the visible expression of the sum of human energies in their organized activity. The best-equipped soldier will win no victories in the absence of conflict, and the wisest programme will avail nothing in valuable results in the absence of opportunities for its execution. As movement is the condition of growth, so appropriate occasions must be supplied to awaken and stimulate the potent but otherwise latent human forces which produce that great work called life. We can not, therefore, conceive of a grand life except when we contemplate capacity in conjunction with its appropriate and sufficient opportunities. A heroic occasion, crowned by a heroic act, sometimes determines before the world a grand life, giving not only its quality but supplying its measure. Such occasions, however, are rare and exceptional. Only here and there in human history is found a Thermopylæ and a Leonidas to stand in the breach.

The common fortune embraces only the ordinary occurrences of humanity, and the excellence that attaches to each well done act must be the measure of the glory that crowns a finished career. While character is an evolution in an important and popular sense, life is a cumulation, to be estimated not by its individual incidents but their aggregate. The grandeur of a career is measured by the sum of the great and excellent things that may have been done. Time, therefore, no less than opportunities, generally becomes an important element of human greatness.

The distinguished statesman whom we seek to honor by these memorial services was fortunate in the possession of the capacities and conditions needful to the largest human success. Gifted with splendid powers, he, in his youth, conceived that ideal upon which his character was formed and his energies directed. He lived in that crucial period of our history when great occasions and inspiring opportunities were constantly supplied; and, finally, the Master of life gave him "length of days," so that he not only scattered but gathered the fruits of his sowing; not only worked and sometimes "went forth weeping," but saw the fruits of his labors and returned "bearing his sheaves with him."

In the life and fortunes of Mr. Hendricks we have a splendid illustration of the honorable successes that will crown definite and sustained effort in public life under our free institutions. He was specific in his purposes—personal, domestic, social, and political. He set himself to do a specific work in every relation of life, and consecrated all his powers continuously and persistently until the end sought was accomplished. To this definiteness of aim, this steadiness of purpose, and its sustained, patient, hopeful endeavor are referable the successes and honors that crowned him. There was nothing episodical in his career; nothing spasmodic in his efforts; nothing fragmentary in his life. In defeat and victory, under cloud and sunshine, he resolutely attempted to realize in action his convictions of duty. He was a typical American citizen and statesman, representing fully as any one who has preceded him the full capabilities and consummations of American manhood. And now, full of years and honors, in the maturity of his character, he has been gathered to his fathers. He wrought wisely, and his life in its round perfected unity praises him.

There is much in the useful and splendid career of Mr. Hendricks which should encourage those who survive him to higher and more unselfish devotion to the country and Government he loved so well and served so loyally.

And there is in that life lessons of courage and firmness, of magnanimity, and devotion to convictions of duty, a steady adherence to principle and a singleness and purity of purpose that should inspire those to whom the destinies of this great Republic are soon to be intrusted with the same excellence of purpose and patriotic devotion to country that made it so conspicuous in shining virtues and crowning glories.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, as one of the members of the House who occupied the executive chair of a State of the Union contemporaneously with Mr. Hendricks's service as governor of Indiana, I have been invited to briefly speak on this occasion.

My personal acquaintance with the late Vice-President was slight, and my knowledge of him mainly confined to sources open to all. While my own political views were in sharp antagonism to those held by him, and I often had occasion to express my dissent from his position on many public questions, yet I recognized his ability and admired his kindly nature and unspotted private character.

Though I met Mr. Hendricks socially only once, yet I saw enough of him on that occasion to understand the secret of his great personal popularity in Indiana. The kindliness of his manner, his affability toward all who approached him, and his uniform courtesy to the humblest, united with a dignity and self-poise which lent a charm to his presence, made him hosts of friends, and even disarmed to a certain extent the criticisms of political opponents.

In the heat of party conflicts, characterized so often by unjust assaults on personal character, I do not remember to have heard or read any charge reflecting on Mr. Hendricks's integrity. Certainly if any such charge was ever made it fell harmless at his feet. His private life was above reproach, and his example a beneficent influence in the community in which he lived. The loving tenderness of Mr. Hendricks's domestic life, as illustrated by incidents which have found their way into print, has made his memory in this respect a sweet savor wherever happy homes are recognized as the citadel of national virtue and the hope of the world.

The time came to the late Vice-President, as it must come sooner or later to all, when the honors of this world, high as were those with which he was crowned, faded into insignificance, and the soul's queries of "What then?" asserted their rightful pre-eminence. In such a supreme test of truth infidelity and skepticism disclose their nakedness, and only the eye of Christian faith can look through the somber cloud and see the golden lining on the other side.

Such a faith Mr. Hendricks avowed and leaned on when declining health admonished him that the end of this life approached and the life beyond drew near.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, I never felt greater regret at the absence of my former colleague, Mr. Cox, from this House than on the present occasion, when the friend of his youth is the subject of eulogy. With his insight into character, his charming felicity of language, his grace of illustration, justice would have been done on behalf of the State of New York to the memory of the departed statesman.

My personal acquaintance with Thomas A. Hendricks only began after his nomination for Vice-President on the Democratic ticket in 1876. I was, of course, familiar with his career during the many years when he made his record in his own State and in the Senate of the United States as a faithful public servant, as the advocate of sound political principles, and as the opponent of legislation which tends to create privileged classes and to enrich the few at the expense of the many.

So high a position did Mr. Hendricks occupy in the public esteem that his nomination for first place on the ticket was earnestly pressed, and possibly by a majority of the Democratic voters really desired. When, however, other considerations prevailed, Mr. Hendricks, like a soldier under orders, cheerfully accepted the second place on the ticket, and contributed greatly to the success of the campaign which resulted in the election of Tilden and Hendricks to the highest offices in the gift of the people. It was during this great struggle that I first made the personal acquaintance of the departed statesman, and the friendship then commenced continued unbroken until his death.

The impression made upon me by my first interview with him was strengthened by continued intercourse. He was a direct-minded and single-hearted man. He had no concealments and no reserve of confidence from those who were brought into relations of intimacy with him. His mind naturally found its way to the elementary conditions of truth, and there were no devious methods of thought or action by which the truth thus found was ever obscured or perverted.

Starting thus on the fundamental basis of principle, his logic was severe and irresistible. He never stated a proposition which he did not justify by adequate fact and argument. His unswerving fidelity to the Democratic party was due to his absolute faith in its principles. He did not deny the patriotism of his political adversaries, and he recognized their partial acceptance of the doctrines which, from the time of Jefferson to the era of the civil war, had ruled the policy of the country.

But in one respect he thought there was a fundamental distinction. He did not regard the Republican creed as calculated to secure equal rights to all men. Hence he was always firm in his adherence to the Democratic party, because he believed that the welfare of the people could only be secured by the fullest recognition of its principles. He was thus necessarily a partisan, but always sincere, always manly, always truthful. This sincerity of character was best understood where he was best known, in his own State of Indiana, which delighted to honor him with its highest rewards, and twice cast its electoral vote for him when any other man would have lost the State. In 1880 the experiment was tried, and Indiana gave its vote to the Republican candidates. In 1884 my belief is that his nomination secured the success of the Democratic ticket. It presented an issue addressed to the conscience of the people, and in the State of New York especially was so acceptable to a portion of the party, otherwise dissatisfied, that personal grievances were to a large extent swallowed up and postponed to the larger duty of justice to the man in whose person the will of the people had once been nullified. I do not think that I overestimate the value of this feeling of loyalty to Mr. Hendricks both in New York and in Indiana, and but for its existence I am quite clear that no accession of independent voters could have neutralized the strong current of feeling among a portion of the Democratic voters for the candidates of the other party.

This feeling of loyalty was largely due to the disinterested and patriotic course of Mr. Hendricks during the agitation which followed the election of 1876. It was not his business then to lead the party, but he was always ready to be consulted and to give advice. He showed no reticence in counsel and no lack of confidence in the men who were intrusted with the leadership of the party. He concurred cheerfully in the conclusions at which they arrived, and he did not put or keep himself in the position of approving their action if it should succeed or of disavowing it if it should fail. Neither when an adverse result was reached did he express any vain regrets as to his hard fortune, and he never called in question the courage and patriotism of the Congressional representatives of a majority of the people in the decision of one of the gravest problems ever encountered in the political history of the world. On the contrary, he recognized to the fullest extent the untiring diligence, the unshaken fidelity, the true wisdom of the Democratic majority who passed the measure of settlement by which peace and order were secured to the nation at the cost only of a temporary delay in the transfer of the administration to democratic control. It was thus that Mr. Hendricks gained the respect of the nation and insured his place in history as a statesman and a patriot.

I have said that Mr. Hendricks was necessarily a partisan, but I have endeavored to show that his partisanship was never exerted at the expense of his patriotism. I have been moved to this statement because I have observed a disposition in some quarters to exaggerate and extenuate his partisan feelings. There is no reason for any apology or explanation so far as his views in regard to appointments to public office are concerned. These views coincided with the opinions expressed by Washington and Jefferson, and were once at least clearly defined. I quote from his letter of acceptance of the Democratic nomination in 1876, in which he said:

In the reform of our civil service I most heartily indorse that section of the platform which declares that the civil service ought not to be "subject to change at every election," and that it ought not to be made "the brief reward of party zeal, but ought to be awarded for proved competency and held for fidelity in the public service." I hope never again to see the cruel and remorseless proscription for political opinions which has disgraced the administration for the last eight years. Bad as the civil service now is, as all know, it has some men of tried integrity and personal ability. Such men, and such men only, should be retained in office; but no man should be retained, on any consideration, who has prostituted his office to the purposes of partisan intimidation or compulsion or who has furnished money to corrupt the elections. This is done and has been done in almost every county in the land. It is a blight upon the morals of the country and ought to be reformed.

I hold this to be the true doctrine in regard to appointments to office, and if it has been violated I am not aware that Mr. Hendricks ever uttered a word or did an act which attaches the responsibility of its violation to his memory.

I have spoken of the simplicity of Mr. Hendricks's character. But with it went, as is always the case with noble natures, the calm dignity of conscious intellectual power and controlling moral force. It was my privilege in 1877 to introduce Mr. Hendricks into a circle representative of the culture, the genius, the intelligence, and the rank of Great Britain. There were present statesmen, authors, cabinet ministers, members of the aristocracy and of the royal family, between whom the intercourse was as delightful as it was unconstrained. Mr. Hendricks, fresh from the great contest from which he had emerged as a victor without the fruits of victory, was naturally an object of great interest, and was surrounded by a circle of intelligent men and charming women. His bearing was that of a man who had passed his life in courts, and his republican manners were marked by natural tact and graceful courtesy. He was the equal of the first gentleman of the land in dignity, and the peer of the greatest statesman present in intellect and conversation. It was on this occasion that I heard him approve and defend the wisdom of the Electoral Commission which had awarded the Vice-Presidency to his opponent. Salus populi suprema lex was quoted as the final principle upon which public action is to be based, and of his adherence to this doctrine the whole life and career of Mr. Hendricks is a convincing proof.

For him the conflict of life is past with honor. He has fought the good fight. For us his example remains, urging us to be, as he was, diligent in the public business, careful in judgment, faithful in action, and, above all, patriotic in the discharge of the gravest duties which have ever fallen to the lot of men, in that we represent the idea of self-government, upon the successful issue of which will depend largely the welfare of mankind. Toward the final consummation for which we strive Thomas A. Hendricks contributed in his day and generation his full share of labor and of achievement, and as a man of the people he will not be forgotten by the people in whose service he lived and died.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, history repeats itself. Not a month passes but the sad tidings come to us that a notable man has fallen. It was but yesterday that Thomas A. Hendricks was with us; to-day he is gone—

To solve the mightiest mystery of all.

To-day his associates in public life pause in the shadow of the national bereavement to speak of his public services and his personal virtues. He of whom we speak has gone where earthly honors and mortal eulogies are as empty sounds, but the homage we pay the dead softens the asperities of partisan life and incites a virtuous emulation; "it exerts a harmonizing influence on the universal heart, and promotes the formation of a true nationality." Standing far from him in party politics, differing from him on almost every question of public policy, antagonizing him, often warmly, and perhaps bitterly, in partisan controversy, I acknowledge his great talents and pay a sincere tribute to the integrity of his public and the blamelessness of his private life.

His public record belongs to the country; it will be judged in the tribunal of public opinion. As in the case of others who were prominently identified with that most tempestuous epoch in our national history, many will approve, many condemn it. We always judge our adversaries from our point of view, and take it ill if they discard our ideas and act and speak according to their own. To do even and exact justice we should view them not from our position, but from theirs.

In passing upon the opinions and actions of those who have thwarted our purposes and sharply criticised our most cherished convictions we should remember "that he who is most charitable in judgment is generally the least unjust."

In life, in the excitements and bustle of our active and progressive life, in the scramble for place, because of our ambitious jealousy for preferment, blinded by our selfishness, we withhold from the living what is justly theirs; but when we stand in the presence of the dead it is creditable to our common humanity that the generous impulses of our nature come to the front and rebuke the unreasoning prejudice which denies sincerity of conviction and honesty of purpose to those who refuse to indorse our opinions or accept our policy.

Mr. Hendricks was not only a most distinguished citizen, but was the second officer of a great Republic. A position so exalted, so honorable, would not have been bestowed by the voluntary suffrages of the people had he not impressed himself upon the public thought and won a place in the popular heart. Personal worth and great abilities only could have secured this high evidence of a people's confidence.

A tall man was he among the people, conspicuous for his abilities. A strong man by the power of his eloquence and the breadth of his acquirements, he won his way in the ranks of his party to near its leadership.

If not the leader of his party in his State, Mr. Hendricks was a force that commanded its supremest respect. He won this distinction by his character, his genius, his personal magnetism. His party gave him its undivided allegiance and promoted with undeviating zeal his every ambition. In his canvasses for governor, Senator, President, he had no rival in the ranks of the Indiana Democracy. He was, without challenge, its chief representative. If he did not formulate its policy, he accepted it as the true faith; if he did not go before, he kept well abreast of the party alignment, went into the thickest of the fight, congratulated his forces in victory, or in defeat covered their retreat. He was not a political boss. He commanded without using the tone of a master; he governed without whip or bastile; he was king, but reigned by common consent and made his subjects his peers. He managed the methods and the language of politics with marvelous dexterity. He was cautious, artful, plausible, and at all times perfectly self-posessed.

It was said:

There was something in the mere aspect of a large popular assembly which had for him a special attraction. His manner in addressing a mixed audience was peculiarly his own—neither that of conversation nor oratory; something better suited than either to his purpose. He was one of the most impressive and successful of public canvassers. He did not disregard the unconsidered trifles of the campaign. There was an affluent grace in his salutations which largely supplemented his argument. He was, moreover, a man of normal action and opinion, following the ordinary bent and tenets of his party; no fanatic, extremist, or zealot upon any subject; not such a one as the multitude often follow, but a character smoothly rounded to completeness, without edges or angles, with no corners in his creed; yet he was, and continued to be, a popular favorite to the last.

Mr. Hendricks was not of the Mirabeau and Danton school of orators—orators who inaugurate tumult and revolution. He did not make harangues that "sent hands to the sword-hilt and men to battle as to a banquet." Over his party adherents he maintained an almost absolute mastery. For years his party was out of power and he wholly without patronage, but he held it to his fortunes, and there was no sign of revolt. His defeats seemed to intensify its devotion and arouse it to greater effort.

A marked trait in Mr. Hendricks's mental equipment was his conservatism. He was too much wedded to usage and tradition to tolerate without challenge a departure from them. He reverenced a long-established national policy, and thought to touch it was to profane a sacred thing. He accepted the Constitution as the earlier statesmen had fashioned it, and sought to arrest the revolution that wrote in it, with the point of the bayonet, a new charter of human rights. He would have repressed the inspiration for liberty born of the shock of battle to save to posterity without amendment the institutions of the fathers. The Constitution as it was challenged his admiration, and he maintained that to touch it was to endanger the public safety. His views were overruled, and what resulted is history irrevocable forever. Neither approval nor criticism will recast it nor affect public or individual opinion. Conservatism as a political force, however, has its uses. It calls a halt; it argues; it demands a reason for every innovation upon existing conditions. It checks imprudent zeal and gives time for cool deliberation. Only when it stands out against facts, against logic, against public opinion, and against human progress, is it censurable.

Against the integrity of Mr. Hendricks as a public servant no tongue has uttered a word. His fame as an honest man is unsullied by even a suspicion. He was ever true to himself, to his honor; no temptation beguiled to venality, and no dishonest dollar touched the palm of his hand. In an age like ours, when vice yields more revenue than virtue, when fortunes are so often obtained without labor, and money, not merit, wins position and power, one who lives an honest and upright life is worthy the admiration of mankind.

Monuments of marble or bronze should be erected in our public places to keep the memory of such imperishable. Had Mr. Hendricks devoted himself to the law and stood aloof from the excitements and exactions of politics he would have been among the foremost lawyers and advocates of this or any country. As it was, he stood in the foremost rank. He had many natural advantages; a voice of melody, a pleasing countenance, a cultivated intelligence, a clear and easy elocution. There was in his manner in court and before the jury that which was captivating. When he spoke he had no recourse to rambling epithets, stilted metaphor, or frenzied declamation. He wasted no time in his exordiums, but grappled the point in controversy without delay. His ideas were never trivial nor his language inflated. His words were generally of simple Saxon, his logic elevated and forcible; there was neither extravagance of expression nor of gesticulation. Some of his contemporaries at the bar were more picturesque and vehement, but none were more graceful or adroit. He was at times touchingly eloquent, his pathos moving the feelings and moistening the eye of the most obdurate. He resented an assault upon the instant and sometimes with marvelous bitterness, but he always maintained a perfect mastery over his passions. He was both dignified and courteous in his bearing, and commanded the most respectful attention from all.

In the memorial of the bar his professional associates say:

Mr. Hendricks was throughout the whole period of his active life a lawyer, even in his last days concerned in the conduct of causes. His entrance upon and employments in public life were episodes, excursions, useful to himself and others, but did not divert him from the beaten path of forensic labor. On the floor of the Senate, in the halls of legislation, he sojourned—at the bar, in the courts, he dwelt.

As a citizen, neighbor, friend, he was unrivaled among men. In these walks he was beloved by all. To his friends

He seemed the thing he was, and joined
Each office of the social hour
To noble manners, as the flower
And native growth of noble mind;
And thus he bore without abuse
The grand old name of gentleman.

The courtesies of his life were broad and generous. He was always the polite and genial gentleman, kind and tolerant. His private life deserved all admiration; tender and blameless in his social relations—devoted to his friends, affectionate in his family, simple, upright—these virtues are his eulogy, more eloquent than tongue can utter.

If—

To live in the hearts he left behind
Is not to die,

Mr. Hendricks has only gone nearer the Eternal Light—has but crossed the lowlands to dwell on the mountain-top. But he is dead, and, though ripe in years and honors, died all too soon. Into the quiet of his home death entered unannounced, and "his spirit drifted away on the bosom of that dark and shadowy river" that flows with resistless sweep into the shoreless sea.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the life of Thomas A. Hendricks was singularly rounded and complete, and it is not surprising his death excited lamentation general and sincere. We are advised by divine inspiration that "no man liveth and no man dieth unto himself." The incidents of this notable and honorable career, the story of this leader of men, have been fully depicted by loving friends, and the lesson of wisdom they teach has been eloquently enforced. The whole field has been covered, so that even to a scrupulous and careful gleaner there is little to add.

One characteristic of Mr. Hendricks to me lent constant beauty to his life. He was the embodiment of that old Latin saying, Mild in manner, resolute in conviction. His ways were gentle and kind, but in a matter of right or wrong he was fixed and immovable. No seductions could allure, no terrors frighten him; to duty he was fidelity itself. He was easy of approach. He dwelt in greatest intimacy with his neighbors. He knew the heart-beats of the people. He could not be deceived as to their wishes. To his earnest good-will they responded with the most generous confidence. His gentleness of manner won them to his presence, and then his learning, firmness, honesty, fidelity, and logic bound them to him.

As he was greater than others individually by whom he was surrounded, so, too, he was always stronger than any political organization to which he was attached. He was a devoted student of the principles of our republican Government. He anchored his hope in their preservation, in their pristine integrity. He was the firm defender of our well-balanced powers and the distribution of duties between State and General Government. He believed that our liberties were secure only when all tendency to parental government and toward centralization was resisted and destroyed. Full scope was to be given for the regulation of mere local affairs to the home rule of State Legislatures, and the action of Congress was to be confined to legitimate Federal affairs.

In his public conflicts he never lost the sweetness and gentleness of his daily life. He was fixed as fate in his resolution, and yet as affable and unruffled as if he sailed only over summer seas.

It is fitting and proper that the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania should pay the tribute of its affection to the memory of Thomas A. Hendricks. He was the descendant of one of her own children. His uncle, who was the sole Representative from Indiana to Congress from 1816 to 1822, governor of that State from 1822 to 1825, and from the latter year to 1837 its United States Senator, was born in Western Pennsylvania, in Westmoreland County, as likewise was the father of Thomas A. Hendricks, who in after years, in addition to the honors worn by his uncle, was elected to the Vice-Presidency of the United States. They were Scotch-Irish pioneers, belonging to a race of men of splendid physical form, courage, and endurance, and renowned for their mental vigor and strength of character. These pioneers were the ancestors of many distinguished families of the South and West. Wherever these brave men fixed their abode the land brought forth abundantly and the people prospered.

The late Vice-President died as he had lived, calmly and serenely.

Like a shadow thrown
Softly and sweetly from a passing cloud,
Death fell upon him.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Speaker, the uppermost thought in my mind is the inscrutable Providence manifested in the death of our late Vice-President at a time when in our worldly calculations we seemed the least prepared for it. It again enforces the lesson so often taught and so hard to learn, that God moves in a mysterious way

His wonders to perform;
He plants His footsteps in the sea
And rides upon the storm.

This thought of an overruling Providence in our national and individual affairs can alone lead us to a true conception of our duties and responsibilities. We will not forget that this same Providence has directed, guided, and shaped the affairs of our country from the landing of the colonists at Plymouth and Jamestown until the present hour. Idolized leaders of a party, champions of constitutional liberty, lovers of our unexampled form of government die and we feel the most painful depression. When the death of Thomas A. Hendricks was announced the calamity was so great, and without warning, that the whole country was filled with the most profound sorrow and tears irresistibly filled the eyes of the people.

Thomas A. Hendricks was born in Ohio, but early in life, when only six months old, his father crossed the State line and gave him to Indiana. That State, therefore, formed the theater of his early struggles. There he engaged in laying the foundation of that usefulness bounded by no State lines, and for which the whole nation with one accord—all hearts and minds united—give thanks to God and praise to our free institutions.

His life proved an eventful one. He was an able and accomplished lawyer, a statesman without spot or blemish, a Democrat from the deepest convictions, and therefore a partisan, but deserving and receiving the highest respect of the best men of all political parties. I find one of the most concise, comprehensive, and just tributes to his character and memory in the Franklin Jacksonian that I have noticed, as follows:

As a statesman he was the champion of the Constitution, the pioneer of peace, the prince of patriots, of tried courage, lofty wisdom, broad intelligence, noble aspiration, and true manhood. He always planted the royal banner of pardon and love upon the battlements of sectionalism or personal strife. As a personal friend we idolized him. On his bosom radiated the star of honor, and to whose memory will be issued the highest patent of nobility. His impress will be left upon the country so long as truth, courage, and fidelity to principle shall find a home in the hearts and hopes of men.

Mr. Speaker, these memorial exercises should not be regarded as a waste of time or unprofitable, for they are in obedience to the natural instinct of mankind and preserve a custom most agreeable to the human heart and creditable to the sober judgment of all. The most cultivated nations of the earth manifest the tenderest regard for the great and good men called from time to eternity.

It is an occasion when the purest emotions prevail and hearts grow warm with the inspiration of the hour, and all recognizing the solemnity and sacredness of the hour reverently recall the life struggles and triumphs and recount some of the noble deeds of the well-spent life of the illustrious man whose memory is so dear to us.

It is to me a great privilege to join my countrymen heart to heart on this memorial day, as I did on the day when the mortal body of our distinguished American citizen was so tenderly and lovingly consigned to the grave.

Glowing oratory, as enduring as the history of our country, has already furnished the most feeling and impressive expressions of merited laudation. Those who knew him best have been peculiarly qualified to present his character in the most appropriate language. History will hereafter furnish pages showing how his life was inseparably interwoven with the preservation and perpetuity of our constitutional form of government.

History informs us that when Xerxes stood in the presence of an immense host of men he wept at the thought that within a hundred years all of that immense mass of human beings would be dead and moldering in the earth. He probably felt that all of life consisted in worldly aspirations, hopes, triumphs, wealth, and other temporal surroundings, and realized for the moment their uncertainty and utter feebleness to satisfy the cravings of the mind and heart.

How different with us. Under the benign influences of our modern civilization and Christianity we look beyond and within the frail tenement of clay—we look at more than the feeble, dying body with its earthly surroundings—and see within the body the soul, the real man. This thought on this occasion should lead us to contemplate the characteristics of the life of Governor Hendricks in his relations of husband, father, friend, and Christian. Those who knew him best bear testimony to the fact that he was not only great in all the walks of public life, but he was greatest and grandest under his own roof-tree, in his own home, surrounded by his own family and friends. Here his purity, his gentleness, kindness, and grandeur shone forth so that no one could fail to appreciate them.

He lived and died a Christian. In the public mind there exists a deep-seated conviction that two legitimate callings in life furnish the most serious obstacles to the maintenance of a pure, consistent Christian character. These are the legal profession, with its absorbing and exciting duties and its infinite variety of temptations, and political life, where the heart is exposed to all the evil influences known among men. Either furnishes the severest trials and unerring tests of the soul's fidelity to its highest mission.

Governor Hendricks boldly and manfully entered both fields of labor and exposure, and throughout maintained a character of the greatest degree of purity and Christian excellency attainable on earth.

Having met and overcome all evil influences, he died with a heart decked with Christian graces and ripe for a glorious immortality. What an example for admiration and imitation! Who would not lead such a life that he might die such a death?

Measuring time by years he lived three-score years and five, nearly the average time granted to our race; but the length of life is best measured by its usefulness. He lives most who thinks most, feels the noblest, and acts the best. Applying this standard, my estimate of the man will not permit me to fix a limit.

He was a stern, immovable friend of the people. He guarded their interests with untiring vigilance. He mingled with them familiarly, studying their wants and seeking to serve them. His elevation to power and place never separated him from the people. In all the struggles during his long public life affecting the people—the weak, defenseless, and dependent—his sympathies and pure judgment never failed to array him on their side. He was most emphatically a man of the people, carefully seeking their highest interests and at all times ready manfully to maintain them. This secured for him the unfaltering friendship and undying love of the people he served so well. It made him their leader in every contest. Their faith in him was unwavering.

This was most strikingly displayed on the day when the last sad tribute to his mortal remains occurred in the city where he had lived. It was the most impressive outpouring of the sorrowing people that I ever beheld. Men, women, and children of all classes united in exhibiting the heartfelt sorrow that everywhere prevailed.

Political differences were for a time buried and forgotten, and all vied with each other to consecrate the day to the expression of the unfeigned sorrow and pure love that filled every heart. A noble specimen of our race, faithful to his friends, his country, and his God, had peacefully passed from labor to rest, and no better eulogy could be pronounced, no monument or statue of marble or bronze could equal in value or so charm a thoughtful person as that vast assembly of all classes and creeds with bowed heads and sorrowing hearts, each feeling and acting as if the dearest earthly object had been removed.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, already, in the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol, have appropriate eulogies been pronounced upon the life, character, and public services of Thomas A. Hendricks. Distinguished Senators and statesmen have vied with each other in extolling his virtues and commending his public services. After all that has been said in the Senate heretofore and in this House to-day it seems quite unnecessary to add anything further. But I may be pardoned for detaining the House for a few minutes longer in order to contribute my humble testimony to his many noble qualities of head and heart.

His early life was spent on a farm; he learned to labor in his youth. His parents settled in Indiana more than sixty years ago. There were no railroads, telegraphs, or daily papers then. The State was covered over with almost impenetrable forests. The red men still occupied their wigwams east of the Wabash. The settlers of that day had to contend with all of those adverse circumstances which attend the building of homes and opening up of farms in the wilderness. The epoch in the world's history from the birth to the death of Thomas A. Hendricks is the most important of which there is any record. The man who lived during these sixty-six years witnessed more of human progress, more of improvement in the arts and sciences, more discoveries of useful inventions, greater developments of material resources, more rapid advances in civilization, in morals, in education, in religion, than did the generations who lived through any half-dozen centuries of prior history. During this golden era of the world's greatest achievements Mr. Hendricks was for more than forty years a conspicuous figure. He served four years as a member of this House, four years as a Commissioner of the General Land Office, four years as governor of the State of Indiana, and six years as United States Senator. He received a large majority of the popular vote in 1876 for Vice-President of the United States, and was elected to that office in 1884 by the votes of the electoral college. In performing the duties of these important positions he illustrated, both by precept and by practice, the maxim that "a public office is a public trust."

While Commissioner of the General Land Office, the lands in Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and other Western States were being rapidly taken up as homesteads by the people. About four hundred thousand land patents were issued during his term of office, and twenty-two thousand contested land cases were decided. He was equal to the demand upon his time and strength. In public stations he was a faithful, painstaking worker. His time, his strength, and his great abilities were given wholly to the duties of his office. No stain rests upon his character; he was true to every trust confided to him.

But he was not free from personal attacks. In the midst of heated political contests partisan feeling often runs so high that the very best and purest of our statesmen are subjected to the most outrageous abuse. Partisan malice and personal hatred did not spare even so good a man as Thomas A. Hendricks. But he was indifferent to such assaults. He believed that truth would prevail in the end. He said on one occasion:

> Because of a supreme indifference to false reports of a political nature concerning myself in times past my friends no doubt have been greatly distressed. But—> an honest man was never more stupidly engrossed than when hunting down a lie, except such a one as offends the moral and religious sentiment of a people. I shall refuse to pay attention to any other.

Said he—

He did not spend his time in answering false accusations. His whole life, both public and private, attested the purity of his motives and gave the lie to every personal attack. His parents were strict Presbyterians. They believed in God and the angels. Their religion was of the practical kind, not a mere outward manifestation. At meal-time it was his father's habit to direct the conversation into a discussion of some religious topic. The lessons of the Scripture were thus brought out and made applicable to the every-day transactions of life. In this way Mr. Hendricks was impressed in his youth with the great truths of the Bible. He learned the value and importance of leading an upright life. The lessons which he thus learned were never forgotten. He repaid the religious teachings of his parents with filial affection, obedience, and acts of kindness. He helped his mother in her household duties, as well as his father in the severer labors of the field. His hands willingly performed the lighter household duties that pertained to womanhood, and his youthful feet went gladly out over the rough places in life to save the strength of his beloved mother and to bear the burden of her domestic care. In after years, in every time of need, he helped his wife as he had helped his mother.

In his domestic relations he was peculiarly happy. The perfection of his wife's character seemed but the rounding out and fulfilling of his own—"these twain were made one flesh."

It is to this perfect union that much of the success of his life may be attributed. He not only found in her a companion, but a counselor, a friend—one in whom he could confide, with whom he could advise, and in whose rare intuitive perceptions he could often find the guidance that he sought. He loved her to the last with a steady, increasing devotion, the memory of which must bring even into her now desolate life a halo of peace. In the sanctity of his home-life was the fulfillment of every desired virtue.

Kind, charitable, humane, ever ready to listen to the humble as to the powerful, and always bearing about with him the attributes of a truly great soul. On one occasion, while he was Senator, a poor friendless woman called upon him and told him the story of her woe, the cause of her coming to Washington. Her husband had been arrested as a spy and had been ordered to be shot. She desired to see President Lincoln and make a personal appeal to him to save her husband's life. She begged Mr. Hendricks to go with her and secure an interview with the President. The Senator yielded to her importunities and took "the little woman," as he afterward called her, to the Executive Mansion. She told her simple story to the great and kind-hearted Lincoln, assured him that her husband was innocent of all intentional wrong, that his life was dearer to her than all else in the world, and implored him to grant pardon now, as he, himself, hoped for mercy and pardon in the last day. The President's heart was moved, and his eyes were filled with tears. The Senator even could not suppress his emotions. Without the Executive Mansion, just across the Potomac, were the contending armies of the great rebellion. Thunders of columbiads could almost be heard in the city of Washington. A million of men were in the field in deadly conflict. But the Commander-in-Chief of our armies and a distinguished Senator, since elected Vice-President of the United States, were so imbued with the finer instincts of our nature as to give heed even in the midst of war to the plaintive story of a heart-stricken wife pleading for the life of her husband. She did not plead in vain, a pardon was immediately granted, and the two great statesmen, President and Senator, and the little woman all wept together for joy.

Mr. Hendricks's whole life abounds with acts of kindness, of charity and friendly assistance. On one occasion a friend of his had continued sickness in his family. Mr. Hendricks was overwhelmed with professional and official duties and could not give his personal attention to his friend's stricken family. But he wrote a letter, unsolicited, inclosing his check for $250, stating that was his contribution to aid in securing good nurses and medical attendance, and regretting that he could not personally contribute his own time and assistance. He was not only kind and charitable but courteous and gentlemanly. He attracted personally those who were opposed to him politically. Under all circumstances he bore himself with moderation, with dignity and simplicity. He was easily approached, attractive in manners, and considerate of the feelings of others.

As a popular speaker he had but few equals in this country. He held his audiences in wrapt attention. His delivery and voice were pleasing and attractive. He was capable of enlisting the most enthusiatic applause or moving his audience to tears. But he never failed to deeply impress the minds of his hearers. To his persuasive eloquence and irresistible logic, his upright life and noble example is attributable, more than to other causes, the fact that Indiana adhered so steadily to the political party to which he belonged.

Mr. Hendricks has built his own monument. Not the stately shaft of granite that he erected in the cemetery at Indianapolis, but one, imperishable as time, the foundation-stones of which were laid in his youth while still under the paternal roof. From his mother he learned those finer attributes of nature, his unselfishness and his regard for the feelings and rights of others. From his father he acquired the sturdier principles that characterize a noble manhood. On these for a foundation he reared the superstructure of a perfect Christian character, that will live in the hearts of the American people long after the commemorative shaft of granite shall have perished.

As—

"Death lays his icy hands on kings"

so must all die, sooner or later. Our Vice-President was no exception to the inexorable law. In his death the people mourned the loss of a great and good man. Universal sorrow was manifested on every hand. The highest honors were paid him. But these honors and the people's sorrow can not call him back to earth again. He has passed from the busy and exciting scenes of this life to the sweet repose of the blessed. But, to such as lived as he lived, even in "the hour and article of death," in the silent tomb, in the Day of Judgment, in the life to come, all is well—all is well.

Mr. LOWRY. Mr. Speaker, the mournful fact is at last fully realized. Thomas A. Hendricks is forever lost to earth! The language of eulogy has never been more fittingly employed than when used so considerately here and in the still higher council chamber in the other end of this Capitol in extolling the life and character of our deceased Vice-President. The circumstances surrounding his father's family and the more remarkable incidents following upon his crossing the threshold of life; the story of his boyhood and youth; the opening promise of manhood's early dawn; the illustrious achievements of his maturer manhood in the forum, on the rostrum, and in these and other legislative halls, and the high qualities which adorned his executive career have all been admirably dwelt upon, not alone by those who stood by his side and shared the vicissitudes of the eventful scenes through which he passed, but by those also who were wont to stand from him apart or were themselves conspicuous adversaries in the several arenas where his highest honors were achieved and his brightest laurels won. In a word, the full symmetry of his illustrious career, the beauty and grandeur of his character, and the impressive lesson of his great life have all been stamped here in words of enduring eloquence on the legislative annals of his country. His exalted virtues, patriotic services, and great deeds are engraven upon the hearts of his countrymen. Memorials to perpetuate the memory of his great excellences are eagerly being constructed in tablets of bronze and monuments of enduring marble. What more shall be said or done? At this point in these ceremonial exercises for me to attempt more here would be superfluous. Exemplary and generous citizen! Patriotic public servant! Best poised and greatest of contemporary Indianians! Typical American! Wise and revered statesman! Honored friend! We can but lay our heart-warm tribute on thy tomb! While doing so, Mr. Speaker, in contemplation of such a life, and in the presence of a whole nation's bereavement by such a death, we may perchance recall the words of one who would fain have found out the great mystery of human life:

We are born, we laugh, we weep,
We love, we droop, we die;
Ah, wherefore do we laugh or weep?
Why do we live or die?
Who knows that secret deep?
Alas! not I.

But those who most knew and best loved Thomas A. Hendricks can not but cherish with intenser hope the general aspiration of humanity that there is beyond the "secret deep" an abode for those who here walk in virtue's path and love their fellow men. That being so, the great soul which shone forth in the placid dignity of his earthly presence is now beaming with delight from happier spheres in contemplation of the manifestations here and everywhere presented of the existence of an absolute conviction of the purity and excellence of his lifetime purposes and of the results which his teachings aided so largely to establish—the unification, prosperity, and happiness of his country.

Mr. OWEN. Vice-President Hendricks has joined the "silent senate of the dead."

At his death a great sadness fell on many hearts, for he was a man of the people. No citizen of the Republic had a larger personal following. Thousands who differed from him felt that in some way he was by their right hand. In that "habitation, giddy and unsure, built upon the public mind," he lived for a quarter of a century in undisturbed tenure. Our era has witnessed an exciting struggle over governmental policy and national principle, and in the "forefront of its every battle could be seen his burnished mail;" not that he sighed for the gage of battle—his nature was the reverse; not that he loved disputation—his soul was for concord; not that he was ambitious of leadership—he preferred an undistinguished equality; but when he took a stand it was seen, and followers rallied to it. His position became the center of desire.

Measured as an orator he was not among the greatest, nor as a jurist, nor as a statesman. He was crowned by no dizzy promontory of genius while the remainder of his nature was shrunken in barrens. Creation had given his parts with even generosity. He was of a well-ordered growth, equally advanced in all bearings, so symmetrical in his developments that we did not catch his measurements until he had gone and we beheld the vacancy. Taken as orator, jurist, leader, husband, man, all and in all, his equal is rare.

What made him a leader, I do not know. Wherein was his strength I can not answer. You can understand the shaft yonder, but who knows a mountain? Our estimate of greatness is on a temporary quality. It is something we can fathom. We want dash; we must have it lurid. This is our ideal. Time cools enthusiasm, admiration wanes, and our favorite hobbles into oblivion, while we award the crown otherwhere. Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, Grant, Cromwell, Hampden grew to be towers among men; but they are not our described heroes. In their day men were persistently showing where they were failures and their evident lack of ability. It was only when they achieved indestructible results that a niche was hewn for them in the world's Westminster. Take any one of their parts, and it seems nowhere large or strong. It appears weak. It is weak within itself. But the strength is the way in which the timbers are built into the tower. Mr. Hendricks's construction was wrought in a manner which eludes description, but it singularly fitted him for leadership in his party.

He met distinguished achievements on the forum. His speech ran flexible as the brook. His uttered thoughts took the form of such chaste simplicity you did not realize their vigor. He was ornate only on requirement. His figures of speech were emphasis, and his illustrations arguments. His epithet fell like the Persian headsman's sword. His wit flashed like Randolph's, but without venom. His logic was instinct with power, and moved in ever augmenting procession. Aroused, his form straightened, grew stationary, the cheek pallid, and the stately march of his eloquence moved with the majesty of overwhelming storm. When it had passed he looked and acted as though he half regretted the outburst. His voice was a marvelous instrument—a silver lute; its tone caught the ear of reason, and through it there lurked a power that fondled the chords of the heart. He had a magnificent panoply for public address.

Mr. Hendricks became a leader in the stormy days of sectionalism and revolution. In the conflicts of that vengeful period he was on the side of the weaker party. He was a famous tactician; his resources made wondrous display in creating points for attack and in sheltering the broken columns of retreat. Always routed, but never dismayed; baffled, but not discouraged; overthrown, but not crushed; surpassed in strength, but unsurpassed in zeal, his dream was the return of the Democracy to power. His sword was never sheathed and knew no rust. Toward this goal he traveled with the enthusiasm of a worshiper to Mecca,

With an eye that never sleeps,
And a wing that never tires;

and when the restoration was accomplished his own aggrandizement was, I think, the least of his gladness.

Mr. Hendricks was the embodiment of the doctrines and principles of his party. The central theater of his operations was his own State, a State famous for the bitterness of its political animosities, naturally caused by its uncertain relations to the prosecution of the war and legislation following. As the foremost man of his party, he invited and received the fiercest denunciations. A mere youth, by blood and choice I was opposed to him. With all the fierceness of a boy's patriotic ardor I opposed his course, and ripening years have only added gravity to my convictions. That he was sincere in his convictions no one will ever question; that the general tenor of his convictions upon the relations between the North and South was erroneous, I think history will fully establish.

I first saw him at one of his political meetings in the campaign of 1866. After a time I got a little closer to the stand. I liked to hear him talk; his familiar style, his quiet earnestness, his touches of persuasion, his benevolent face, all won me, and henceforth I became an admirer of the man.

The two great rival leaders are now in the sacred fraternity of the tomb. Their outreaching plans soon left the confines of their State and organized a national following. Two more diverse spirits never battled in government before: Morton and Hendricks—Sir Richard and Sir Launcelot, the lion-hearted and the fair knight. The one spoke to men with the majesty of an autocrat; the other talked with men as a man with his fellow. The one always commanded; the other always pleaded. The one brooked no dissent in his following; the other let his train camp wide apart. The one, like Cæsar, would burn eight hundred cities, bathe his sword in a million lives, and wade through blood to preserve the cause he championed; the other, Coriolanus-like, seeing the carnage, the desolation, the anguish, would sheath his sword and turn away. The one could seize the helm when the nation was strained in every fiber; the other might take direction when peace hath her victories. They lie within speaking distance. The vast energies of the one are hushed; the broad powers of the other are pulseless. They have grounded arms, and rest well in immortal renown.

As it fell upon him, the withering breath of time and care was transformed in power, ripening his judgment and touching his words with deeper wisdom. When he unshouldered the weight of his great ambitions and lay down to rest thousands wept, for they loved him; multitudes lost hope, for they had a friend in him. As a leader, in anticipation of great political results, he had made promises. They were based on his views and convictions. He strove to fulfill them, and I respected him for it. Abraham Lincoln, discussing the slavery question, said:

I believe a man has a right to eat the bread earned by his own hand.

His home life was well known. A union had been formed there which after near half a century must, I think, have cost the sword of Death an effort to sever. She was wife, he husband; but they never ceased to be lovers, confidants, friends. She was the watch-guard; he the mainstay. He was talked to about the house; she was consulted about the state. The lines of bliss and furrows of care across both brows you could see had been plowed by the same hand. The sun never shone on less than two. The four walls of that home were a section of paradise reset up on earth. Within was a shrine where sacrifice of self was joy, obligations were opportunities, and duties were benedictions. That an angel's wing should bring a shadow to such a home fills the beyond with a sigh and helpless agony here. This side the Passion of Him who was Divine there is nothing in earth or heaven so sacred as the bond of the hearth-stone.

With increasing years he drew affectionately nearer her side. On their last visit to Chicago, whence he went home ill, their inseparability was commented upon. The way was growing doubtful. The lines on his kindly face assumed a darker hue, their voiceless eloquence pleading against separation. Not that he feared death—he had no thought of death; it was nature's premonition of the advancing fate which he obeyed but did not understand.

After reaching home she cared for him, as was the wont of each when the other was ill. Her ministrations were given through the day, and toward evening, as he seemed "free at last," she went downstairs to talk with a friend about the charity society. He lay down on the bed; he was weary, and fell asleep.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I trust it may not be regarded as presumptuous in one so strange and unfamiliar in these surroundings to add a word of tribute to the memory of the distinguished man whose death thus brings us to this pause, and serious contemplation. As I listen, in wrapt attention and with melancholy consolation, to the eulogies which have been pronounced, wherein have been portrayed the character and public services of the dead Vice-President, I have felt it were vain for me to attempt to add to what has been said with such splendor of diction and solemnity of thought. I am not a kinsman; why should I essay to express that unspeakable sense of personal bereavement? I am not an Indianian, and can not depict that deep and sudden shock that tremored through the universal heart of that great State and stopped the course of all its thought when late one autumn evening the electric subtlety whispered in every home and hamlet, "Hendricks is dead;" and the startled bells in every tower and belfry sent their lamentations out upon the midnight air. While I may say I knew him, that acquaintance was from afar; and I have no power to set before you his brilliant social qualities, the generality of his powers, his cherished and unfading friendships, his genial, manly nature, his tender, almost feminine, refinement of sentiment, as those can and do who, from long and close intimacy, have been lured and bound within the close meshes of such noble influences and relations.

But, sir, no great misfortune can befall the people of Indiana that will not send a pang deep felt in Iowa. Remote, with another great State lying between, yet my people find relationship and sympathy with many a thread and clue running myriad-form into all her sister States. The restless spirits of the pioneer and constant intermigration, like weavers' shuttles, have so wrought the warp and woof of our human fabric that the golden threads of Indiana, as of all the States, reach continuous everywhere in Iowa and help enrich and adorn our life and civilization there. Go where you will, there is no spot where you will fail to find the translated lives and undying memories of Indiana and of Indianians. To all these "Hendricks, of Indiana," was the great oak, taking deep root in the soil of their native State, but whose lofty and ever upward branches cast their lengthening shadows into Iowa. Sometimes, in the bitter political contests which, thank God, are now believed to have passed—rolled together like scrolls never to be opened again—when a small but faithful band of his political faith felt they needed help, he would come into what he termed "The Great Prairie State, where republicanism came first and lingers latest" and address our people. And then we drew around him, attracted by our love and admiration for the man and our sympathy in a common cause.

Those who loved the cognomen of "Hoosier" would come, proud to hear and have others hear the good that could come out of the good old "Hoosier State." Others, men of all affiliations, came, for we knew great questions were to be discussed by one "who shed light upon all things touched by him," and who, on all occasions, when most strong was also gentle and considerate equally of those opposed as those united to him. No one understood better than he that the door to the mind's reception of argument and reason must not be rudely assaulted and burst asunder by taunt and epithet. And when the day was done and the great gatherings had dissolved, each to his separate home, the thought, the idea, the higher, purer nature of manly persuasion were scattered like seeds of a new species, which were to grow and blossom, and to-day do grow and blossom in thousands of thoughtful, sorrowing homes and hearts as silent testimonials of his force and goodness and the principles with which he was identified. It was thus we saw and knew him, and the invisible statue thus erected in our hearts will stand till the hearts that knew him thus shall fail.

Not only this, sir; he belonged of right to all of us. Indiana may claim to have been his home and to have nurtured and cherished him. She may justly point with satisfaction to the evidences of his filial gratitude and faithful handiwork to be traced in all her framework of constitution, law, usages, and institutions; yet she must resign all special claim to his large individuality and the legacy of bright example of manhood and American character which he has left to us. These belong to all of us, and can not be confined to the narrow limits of his tomb or his State. He studied the national structure and life and drew deep inspiration from other States and all surroundings. His stature, whether we regard him as the simple, unpretentious, approachable citizen, the profound and erudite jurist, or the broad and comprehensive statesman, had long since crossed the imaginary lines of State divisions. He had taken the upward steps of Congressman, governor, Senator, and Vice-President; steps which, if slow and with many pauses, were always upward.

If in taking that last great step in 1876 he seemed to stumble or fail, it may be doubted if unworthy hands had not tied treacherous grass across the path; but the rectification in 1884 of that mistake or wrong restored him in his course and established that there should be no regression in his career. In the last great political convention which met to determine who should be the choice of a great and anxious party for President he stood as one in a central group of figures to be counted upon the fingers of a single hand. Unostentatious and unassuming he was marked by all. The mention of his name thrilled thousands of hearts into vociferous exultation, and when he did but appear the sea of human faces shone in a desire to honor him, and the vast audience seemed to upheave as if from volcanic emotion. And as it was there in that momentary focus of popular effort, so it was also far out in the calmer and more quiet plains of thought of the general public. He was in the very prime of manhood; not robust, but with faculties still expanding to fill the measure of his life.

If, as has been said by his greatest eulogist, "the very genius of close contests and narrow margins in the ballot presided over his political fortunes," yet under the influences of that very genius he might worthily aspire to still greater honor. Close contests test the virtue of men as well as strength of parties, and by this test he still might face the east and look upon this Dome. Turn back the dial of time; restore to its quiver that Lethe-tipped arrow; let him, with that serene composure and quiet dignity so conspicuous in that scene of pomp and circumstance where even the people of a free Republic are prone to put on the trappings of regal power and grandeur, as we beheld the unjarring transition of our government from the hands of one Executive into those of another—let him come back again into his appointed seat; restore to him the life and opportunity so suddenly extinguished and put out, from which a just expectation and the still fresh suffrages of his countrymen so justly entitled him to anticipate the continuance of their great favor and distinction, then cast the horoscope, and ask the fleeting hours if it be ordered that the destiny of this remarkable man must find its final consummation in the Vice-Presidential chair.

He was of humble origin, and in his early life pursued those simple paths that are open and common to all American youth who choose to follow them. His life tells this great truth: Great success and grandeur of character are not due to outbursts of individual power or the meteoric brilliancy of genius, but are the results of diligent and faithful effort long continued, pursued with the fixed and honorable purpose of doing all things well and faithfully and neglecting none. As a lawyer his great success and commanding position came to him only after he had prepared the way, but he reached the height. His services were sought for far and wide, and there was little of the more important litigation, whether of titles, the bonded indebtedness of counties and municipalities, the obligations of great corporations and the control of courts and States over them in the surrounding States, or that involved grave constitutional consideration, in which he was not retained. At the bar he was known as the courteous and courtly lawyer, who won his way to verdict and judgment upon the force of fact and law, leaving with his antagonist only the sense of having lost, but no feeling of bitterness or reproach. What would have been the development of his character had his course led him upon the bench it is difficult to declare; but it has always seemed that there was a field in which he would have become pre-eminent.

Though a brave and fearless man, he shunned and shrank from the turmoil and bitterness of fierce political contention. When he entered those lists it was always at the behest and under the requirement of his people rather than from inclination. He preferred the retired and quiet halls of justice, remote from the great throbbing activities, where, unvexed by passion and undisturbed by interest, the mind performs its highest duties and exhibits its noblest faculties. Here, without the stimulus of popular favor, unrewarded by results, and indifferent to consequences, under the searching analysis of truth and in accordance with the rules and methods of just, wise, and prescribed laws, the rights of men and States are adjusted and adjudicated. In my conception, here was the home of Mr. Hendricks. No one will deny him that poise and completeness of faculty—the evenness of mental structure and the self-control that never lost its supremacy, which are the requirements for judicial function. He possessed that lofty sense of fellowship and equal right, that profound appreciation of justice, a strength of comprehension and understanding, combined with a knowledge and a love of the law as a study and a science that, had they been developed by opportunity and occasion, would have placed him beside the greatest judicial characters in our own or English history.

As governor, Senator, or statesman, I need not stop to dwell upon his well-known character, for this history has been told by those more familiar with it. It must be conceded him, even by those disposed to take a more limited view of his public career, that it was his misfortune, in a sense, to have lived upon the adverse side of politics during a long and most unhappy period in our history. Questions arose, new and unexpected, which had been anticipated neither by the founders of the Constitution nor those who immediately succeeded them. Search the opinions and the conduct of his contemporaries opposed to him in political life, and there will be found unavoidable and necessary hesitation, vacillation, and uncertainty. In those days, events led and men followed. Questions were settled by the logic of circumstances before statesmen could give them consideration. However much he might differ about methods, he adhered to the traditions of the fathers in profound veneration and devotion to the Constitution as the living conscience of the nation, and in all his instincts, acts, hopes, and aspirations he was for the Union unbroken and indissoluble. Tender as a child, grieved and anxious at the rage and violence of an internecine and bloody struggle, while he was ready to catch at any hopeful project that might terminate the strife, he never doubted or despaired the restoration of the Union. To him the integrity of the Union was as fixed and unassailable as the firmament of God, and it needed only to assuage the passions and restore the judgment of the warring people to have the golden circle of the Union shine out resplendent and entire. He lived to look into the promised land and catch a glimpse of the restoration; and it is a satisfaction to know that the glory of that vision filled his last days with a serene peace, and whatever of untoward events the future may have in store they will not disturb his final rest.

In all the varied positions to which he was assigned he performed well his part in each; his administration was not only marked and notable in the full and perfect discharge of duty, but his record is without spot or flaw—no doubt of his purity, no suspicion of his high and scrupulous integrity ever lingered for a moment.

But, sir, how he was loved by the people of his great and noble State! In a long and eventful life he had been brought into contact with all of them. Again and again had he come into the midst of every locality and community and talked to them at the hustings. He was "Tom Hendricks" and they were "the boys"—not in any wild or unworthy sense, but as friends and equals. He was of them and for them; listened to them; helped them when he could; was just, courteous, and true, until it came to be that when she needed aid Indiana loved to lean upon his sure, great arm; and when "Tom Hendricks" called on Indiana in an hour of need she rose "like waves of ocean hungering for pasture." I need not recount the many political contests which have agitated that great State to illustrate the marvelous hold he had in the faith and affections of her people. In the last great quadrennial struggle we of Iowa watched the contest with an anxiety never to be forgotten. Clinging to the same political faith after a quarter of a century of obloquy and defeat, struggling like men who hope when there is no hope, we knew our battle must be fought and won in other States and by other hands than ours. We felt sure of New York; we needed Connecticut; but did not dwell upon her vote. How was Indiana going, and where was Hendricks? With an anxiety which mere political contests ought not to force upon a people, we beheld concentrated and converging upon her every appliance and every influence from without. We witnessed the invasion of her domain by the "Plumed Knight" and his retainers, and the State practically taken possession of, as Ohio had been the month before. But when that potent but unnatural event had passed, we learned that it had only stimulated into renewed and more tremendous exertion the spirit of our party. We knew that Hendricks had again come forth from self-retirement and had taken the old beaten path that lay so near the homes and hearts of his fellow-citizens, and in the old familiar persuasive voice was summoning them for help once more. "I have pledged them the State. My name and faith are involved. It is I that calls!"

We in Iowa heard the loud shout responsive to the call. At night, by means of telegraph and press, we saw the distant auroral light gleam upward from city, town, and hamlet, all ablaze with torch and zeal. We knew the spirit of Hendricks was abroad in Indiana, and that as sure as the sun should rise on that eventful November day Indiana would be ours if human power could make it so. And when at last the result was known, who was there who did not comprehend that while Mr. Hendricks was second on the ticket, yet it was his to consider which were the higher honor and greater glory, to be, or to make, the President. Sir, I allude to this scene and this result not to recall anything of political consideration, but to illustrate his strength in the love and affections of the people. For when it is known that in this last fierce Presidential election, out of their total voting population, 51 per cent. of California remained at home and did not vote, 45 per cent. in Massachusetts, 22 per cent. of Illinois, 21 per cent. of New York and Iowa, and so on, in Indiana all but 7 per cent. deposited their ballots, the most full and complete vote ever cast by any people at any election—I say when this is known it can be understood where was the pivotal point in the great contest and what influences controlled the result.

Mr. Speaker, when we consider how empty and tasteless are the rewards of honor and the successes of ambition, how vain are the consolations of wealth and power, how full the world is of wreck and failure; when we look down upon the plains of human life and witness the restless, wearied struggle for existence, its discontent and misery, we are led to ask, where is there refuge, what is happiness, and where may it be found? It is not in the camp or court or busy marts where want and penury cry aloud. No, sir; it is only in the home—in that domestic bliss, the only happiness that survived the fall. It arises from that pure and lofty consecration of two lives—one man and one woman—to each other. This is not a mere privilege, but a necessity to our humanity. Without it, life loses its zest, toil its reward, and hope its realization. No one who, by precept or example, imperils the high standard of this awful necessity can be regarded as friend to his fellows or lover of his race. In this direction, with what safety and satisfaction can we turn to Mr. Hendricks! The immaculate purity of his private life is the property and glory of the nation. We may not lift the veil even in this hour of desolation and invade the sanctity of that blissful union between him and her who yet lingers here. We know the golden cord is broken, but the casket yet retains its treasure. Frail pitcher of beauty upon the head of purity, borne safely by faithful feet to the journey's end through rough and tempting paths! Where can the image find pediment or lodgment for contemplation and the perfection of our lives save in the people's home and beside their hearths? And there the life and purity of this Indiana man has helped to elevate it.

But we hear it said, "He was a partisan." The consideration of this criticism requires it not to be forgotten that it comes at a time when new and modified views upon the subject of partisanship are seeking supremacy in public thought. Does it not have the vice of overlooking the fact that men who had reached the age of Mr. Hendricks can not readily divest themselves of the habits and modes of thought cultivated and acquired in a long and active life?

Another important consideration must not be overlooked, the most eventful portion of his life passed in a period of intense partisanship. War engenders fierce passions and swift action even in regions remote from the scenes of strife and ensanguined fields. In those days the political contests of Indiana were no child's play. Political supremacy in that State was relentless and absolute. Right or wrong, for a time Indiana was a State of "suspects" and political arrests. Once the great co-ordinate branch of Government interfered, reaching its hand between the edge of sword and bayonet to save those whom unjust judgment had condemned to death. The bitterness of those days lingered longer than it should, perhaps not with Mr. Hendricks, but with the older men who had felt it most. They had waited through long years and sighed for the restoration of Democratic power in the National Government. He had preached to them the necessity for change, the opening of the books, and the turning out of those who from long continuous lease of power seemed to them to have acquired the features of insolence and oppression. When at last, after weary waiting, they beheld the great event at hand, they demanded the fulfillment. Indifferent himself, free from malice and void of covetousness, he yet could not turn a deaf ear to those requirements of his followers which he himself had originated. They could not appreciate a change—a great overthrow of a political adversary which still left it in power and position, and he could not resist the seeming justice of his people's complaints. If he was a partisan, it was on behalf of those who had inherited something of such partisanship and who had followed wherever he led, and honored him with a constancy and faithfulness that now entitled them to demand what neither worth nor honor could refuse. When we recall what hand he had in making possible the new conditions from which this criticism proceeds it may be safely concluded that the judgment of posterity will be mild and lenient.

But, Mr. Speaker, why these ceremonies and eulogies? Though they might gratify, they reach him not. He needs them not. Are they not really for ourselves? Is it ordained for all to die, and is there a great undertone, never ceasing, which like solemn bell, when we listen, reminds us of mortality? Alas! the deep stream of human life pours on so constant and imperceptible! As generation after generation disappears, the sullen roar of that broad tide where it pours itself down the distant and precipitous cataract into the dark valley of the shadow of death is so remote, inaudible, and low, we live as if we were immortal and would never die. Only when the dreadful dart comes home, strikes with sudden clangor in the circle of our household, or smites down some lofty character intrenched in popular affection, are we startled out of our deaf, absorbed preoccupation into the consciousness of our mortality; and then—then trembling and crouching, we wait expectant till the mourning days are past and it strikes still nearer; then fear and fright again. Fear and fright are the instruments of safety. They forewarn and add speed to flight. But there is no safety, no flight from the universal presence. Only one refuge, one help—prepare, prepare! It requires long years of studious application and wide experience to prepare the garment to appear in before that august tribunal whose seat is near these precincts. The highest social life adorns itself with nicest care, puts on its whitest, costliest raiment when it comes before presidents and ministers of state; but there is a tribunal, a court, where none may enter unbidden and without preparation, not the preparation of an hour or week, snatched in weakness and tremblings from long years of health and boastful strength, but that which comes from long communion with the divine attributes, a noble and willing submission to His visitations and His judgments, the observance of His statutes, and a faith that places all things in the hollow of His great hand. Sir, there is every reason to believe that such was the perfect and acceptable preparation of him whom we deplore; such was the garment of his life. His quiet Christian graces, rounding out and completing the perfection of his character, present a model of matchless manhood beyond the reach of pencil or chisel. The world is better and purer that he lived. Here he stops, but his work and example survive. These ceremonies conclude the chapter of his life. His memory will linger fresh and green in the hearts of the generation that knew him, but when that has been gathered, like the sheaves, he will survive only in the pages of history and the monuments erected to him.

He did not have, perhaps, the loftier and more impressive powers of Webster, the commanding austerity and force of Clay, or the persistent adaptation of Douglas. He was cast in a milder and subtler mold. If he lacked some of the more rugged and controlling features his outlines were softer and more even.

When those die who, like him, have been able, by force of genius, worth, or circumstance, to lift themselves above the common level of their fellows, their lives, as they recede into the past and the world sweeps on, seem like great islands to those who sail away at sea. The detail of event and circumstance soon wanes and fades into mere outline and dim contour.

There are the verdure, mountain, slope, and shore. Within and beyond are lakes of silent contemplation not navigated by shallops and smaller sail; silent streams of purpose and intent not charted on the maps of narrower minds; waters pure as crystal dripping from rough ledges where the public never trod. And so in this great life. There is no grand rugged height lifted by power and violence, no gorge torn by selfishness and distrust, but we behold it like some scene in the State he loved, where the setting sun casts its last rays upon a level, undulating reach of land, gentle and subdued in outline, filled with the scenes and sounds of homes, exhaustless in resources, where peace and contentment dwell safe and secure even when darkness mantles it and hides it from our eyes!

Mr. Speaker, Iowa mourns with Indiana, mourns with all her sisters.

We weep for Adonäis; he is dead.

Mr. KLEINER. Mr. Speaker, Thomas A. Hendricks, whose distinguished public services we commemorate to-day, was a noted man in the political arena while I was yet in my cradle. What I may say of him will therefore add but little to what has already been said to-day on this floor, for I shall devote the few moments which I shall occupy to the events in his life which have passed before my personal observation as an Indianian during the last fifteen or twenty years, and which have long since become a part of the political history of our country.

Governor Hendricks, by which title he was familiarly known to the later generation of Indianians, filled well every measure of duty imposed upon him by the favor of his party. His counsel and advice were eagerly sought by the old and young. Wherever he dared to lead his party was ever ready and willing to follow. A victorious leader either in peace or war often secures the plaudits of men because of his achievements over his vanquished adversary. Not so with the late chieftain whose loss we mourn. If he made any mistakes or had any faults his followers did not stop to consider them or charitably overlooked them, for he never appeared stronger than when he went down to defeat, which was often within the last twenty-five years. Each successive disaster, however, only added to the number of his friends who would rally to his standard, eager to renew the contest whenever or wherever he saw proper to give the word of command. Thus, step by step, from the day Thomas A. Hendricks was elected to the Legislative Assembly of Indiana, thirty-eight years ago, to the day on which he closed his eyes upon the world, he continued to grow in the affections of the people, and died mourned by them, if emblems of sorrow and public manifestation are considered as expressive of a country's grief, one of our most useful, conspicuous, and illustrious citizens.

No man who was ever called to public duty did it better, whether as a legislator of his State in 1848 and 1849, or as a young member of her second constitutional convention in 1850; whether as a member of Congress upon this floor from 1851 to 1855, or as a Senator in the north wing of this Capitol from 1863 to 1869; whether as Commissioner of the General Land Department of his Government, where his great judicial mind developed the rich traits of his character, or as chief executive of Indiana, which office since the admission of the State into the Federal Union seventy years ago is rich in distinguished names both in State and national annals; or whether we find him as Vice-President of the Republic he served so long and well, and within one round of the most exalted station known to the civilized world. In all these he did his duty and did it well.

I feel a just pride in having followed the destiny of this great man and in having aided in my own humble way his well-deserved promotions in his remarkable career. Few men in this nation were so near the popular heart as he and fewer still deserved to be.

But the pale rider selects his own time and place in which to make his assault, and his incongruities are present here. In the lifetime of our friend multitudes surrounded him, honored in their ability to serve him. Nothing that kind hearts could suggest or willing hands could bestow was withheld from their chieftain, and I believe I speak advisedly and truthfully when I say that at no time in his long and useful career was he so near the heart of his party as during the last months of his life, or when under his own roof in the capital city of his own beloved State he bade farewell to the world—alone and unattended—in the words, "At rest at last," and died alone.

Mr. Speaker, thoughtless critics have frequently alluded to his strong partisan convictions as indicative of illiberality and contracted views. This I disclaim, for no man who had the pleasure of his acquaintance even briefly but knew how tolerant he was of the opinions of those who differed with him politically.

Governor Hendricks was a Democrat, a practical Democrat, who believed in its principles and its traditions as embodied in popular democratic government. He was proud of and ever ready to defend his political creed, and this he did in the forefront of a score of political campaigns. He believed that those of his political followers and companions who had gone down to defeat with him in almost innumerable political reverses during a quarter of a century should share the fruits of its victories in the hour of its triumph. When, therefore, in 1884 the Democratic party elected Cleveland and Hendricks as President and Vice-President of the United States he accepted the verdict of the people as expressed at the polls to mean that his partisan followers were best calculated to inaugurate the reforms which his party had promised.

For this reasonable and fair construction of the election he was often derisively termed a "partisan," a "politician," and even a "spoilsman" by an unfriendly press and those of whom it is no discourtesy to say were less sincere, less patriotic, and less courageous than he. It was because he loved his party and believed in its integrity that he stood committed to the idea that its elevation meant burdens as well as honors and responsibilities; that those friendly to its perpetuation and future success should administer its affairs, and in this view the verdict of the future will fully sustain him.

The prudent counselor is gone; the incorruptible statesman is no more among us; but while honest convictions and upright purposes endure, while faithful services to his country find a responsive echo in honest hearts, Thomas A. Hendricks will invoke in the coming generations emulators of his life and example.

Monuments of stone to commemorate his life will rise in the land he loved, but the name and fame of Thomas A. Hendricks will live enshrined in the hearts of his countrymen long after these mere physical mementoes have crumbled into dust.

I offer this as my humble tribute to the exalted virtues of an able lawyer, an eminent statesman, a wise counselor, a patriotic citizen, an honest man, and a kind personal friend.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, I am impelled by the high esteem and admiration in which the dead statesman was held in New Jersey to submit these remarks.

There was perhaps no State in the Union, outside of Indiana, in which Mr. Hendricks was more beloved by the people than in the conservative State of New Jersey. To our people he was the personification of rugged, earnest, honest democracy. In the heat of political contest two names shone like guiding stars to the majority of her people—the names of Thomas A. Hendricks and George B. McClellan. Illustrious soldier and upright statesman, they sleep now, alas! among the great dead of the Republic.

To his contemporaries in his own State, to her great Senator, DANIEL W. VOORHEES, to her great citizen and Representative on this floor, WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, and to others, his neighbors and intimate friends, we can well intrust the story of his life. So eloquently, so graphically will they tell it that he is indeed fortunate in having such survivors.

This great life just closed was not like some new star, discovered in a night. Silently, modestly, persistently it mounted to its zenith. By neither craft, nor trick, nor affectation came this great man to sit on the very pinnacle of the state. How humbly he rose, how grandly and surely he mounted up, has infinite lessons for us all. The people were not attracted to him by any artificial glamour, by pomp and circumstance of war. In an age of military heroes he never, even then, lost his place in their hearts. This quiet, dignified, plain, unpretending citizen excited in the hearts of his fellow-men all the enthusiasm granted those heroic characters who blazed like meteors amid the storm and wreck of devastating war.

Mr. Speaker, humanity is instinctively discerning as to the character of those whom it trusts with great power. The people knew the heart of Thomas Andrew Hendricks pulsated in its every throb for human freedom, individual rights, and self-government the world over. The great central pillar on which the fabric of his character was reared was earnestness—honest, unyielding earnestness. In an age of hypocrites and shams, he stood forth an aggressively honest man. As a lawyer, a statesman, a citizen, he spoke what he believed to be true. He never temporized. I have said he was opposed to all hypocrisies in public and private life. How great was this cardinal virtue we can judge when we recall the terrible picture of the opposing vice drawn by the learned and saintly Jeremy Taylor over a century ago. He says in one of his discourses:

> There is an universal crust of hypocrisy that covers the face of the greatest part of mankind. Their religion consists in forms and outsides, and serves reputation or a design, but does not serve God. Their promises are but fair language and the civilities of piazzas or exchanges, and disband and untie, like the air that beats upon their teeth, when they speak the delicious and hopeful words; their oaths are snares to catch men and make them confident; their contracts are arts and strategems to deceive, measured by profit and possibility; and everything is lawful that is gainful; and their friendships are trades of getting; and their kindness of watching a dying friend is but the office of a vulture, the gaping for a legacy, the spoil of a carcass; and their sicknesses are many times policies of state, sometimes a design to show the riches of our bedchamber; and their funeral tears are but the paranymphs and pious solicitors of a second bride.

He was an earnest partisan. He believed in the Democratic party as embodying the true principles of republican government. He stood by its organization in defeat and victory. He believed in its men as well as its measures. He used to speak affectionately of "the boys," meaning the young men who were so active in its campaigns, and the "boys" in return would have made any sacrifice for him. Party contests on the great field of Federal politics were to him no mimic strife. In the progress of the contest and in garnering the results he was in deadly earnest—in all this, however, courteous, fair, honorable, candid, and gentlemanly, never blatant, boisterous, nor demagogic. There were no neutral tints in his politics. Like all earnest men he had strong opposition to contend with, but was withal heartily respected by his opponents. He was strongly in favor of purging the civil service of incompetent or dishonest officers and of those who had prostituted their offices for partisan purposes, and of filling their places with honest and competent men of his own political faith, who besides being such had rendered honorable and efficient party service. For this a few have caviled at him, but the great bulk of people in both parties honored him for his adherence to this robust American idea, so ably enunciated by Thomas Jefferson.

He was a broad-minded man, and never let his politics settle on any one question to the exclusion of all others. He was by some taunted with timidity, because he stubbornly refused to merge himself in some so-called reform or theory. He met questions as they arose, and never anticipated a movement before it showed signs of life in the great mass of the people. He stood on the solid rock of conservative general statesmanship, and did not need to climb up on some fantastic theory to be seen by the multitude. He had no faith in universal panaceas by act of Congress, and had no time to waste on political nostrums. Faithful adherence to the Constitution was his remedy for troublous questions.

Little men riding their little hobbies go on and off the stage, until hobby and rider are both relegated to the musty obscurity of the property-room, but the broad minded, catholic, far-visioned, prophetic statesman remains for all time. He was an absolutely truthful man. He would have yielded up his life to a mob before denying a tittle of his principles. In the stormy times of civil war and sectional strife he stood as firm as a rock. If he had been the only one left of its defenders he would have stood beside the Constitution like some Titanic defender until hewn in pieces by its enemies. And even as their spears pierced him they would have rendered the homage of respectful admiration. The people rallied to him because they knew he always spoke the truth as he saw it. He never deceived them. To millions of his countrymen his word was an inviolable bond. His character as public man and private citizen was stainless. In an age of corruption, sensation, and abuse, no scandal however faint shadowed his good name, no idle rumor soiled it with polluted breath. What a lesson this well-rounded character is to the young men of the Republic! Aggressive honesty and granite-like integrity are indeed the only sure foundations of a lasting reputation. There are no short and dishonest cuts to enduring fame. They only live in the annals of a free people who are superior to temptation and circumstance.

Above all else Mr. Hendricks was a thorough American. A Christian gentleman, he would have looked kingly in any assembly in his regal simplicity. Kings, dukes, princes, courtiers, were as all other men to him. He was no flunky. He did not, like a certain genial poet, "dearly love a lord." He never tried to ingratiate himself with the debilitated aristocracy of foreign countries. He talked and lived for America and American freemen, and had little time to prate nimbly and obsequiously at banquets of "the mother country." All Europe was to him "the mother country." All mankind, not the favored few, were the objects of legislation and regard. He was no respecter of persons. "The rank is but the guinea's stamp" was his creed.

His heart went out to all peoples struggling for liberty and national autonomy. Throughout his life he was the firm, true friend of Ireland and the Irish people. One of his last public acts, and while Vice-President, was to preside and speak at a monster meeting to aid the heroic struggle for self-government in Ireland. He was beloved by all Irish Americans. Their faith in him and love for him was shown in many a crisis. He was an enemy of tyranny and oppression and a friend of liberty wherever the one reigned or the other struggled.

His domestic life was sweet and holy in its devotion and simplicity. It were rude, if not profane, to intrude on the hallowed domestic ground in which he trod through life with the noble gentlewoman who now so deeply mourns his death. They were truly mated and inseparable companions. Much of Mr. Hendricks's success is due to this bereaved wife, to whom the sympathy of millions of her countrymen and women goes forth to-day.

Mr. Hendricks was fortunate in his ancestry. He had in him a strain of the best blood on this continent. His Ulster Irish ancestors were among the early settlers of Western Pennsylvania. Generally a mountain people, they followed in their settlements along the great Appalachian range from Vermont, through Pennsylvania, Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee, and down into Georgia. Natural-born republicans, they sealed their devotion to American independence on many a bloody field of revolutionary strife. In after years they produced such men as Richard Montgomery, Andrew Jackson, George B. McClellan, Stonewall Jackson, and General J. E. B. Stuart, James Buchanan, Jeremiah Black, General McCalmont, of Pennsylvania, and a brilliant host, no less distinguished. In the history of our country the names and actions of this early immigration stand out in strong letters. Their influence permeates our institutions and helped to found our Government.

His body rests in Indiana soil, but his name and fame live forever in the history of his country. A plain, unassuming, honest man, and yet an illustrious citizen and great leader of the people. Prudent, yet bold, conservative, but convinced he met every question as it arose with resolution, patriotism, and understanding. A Christian, and a man of high honor and strong faith, at the close of a useful and eventful life he died as became him, peacefully. There can be but one regret connected with his political career. Through the storm of contest and the gloom of defeat he had led his party for nearly a quarter of a century, to die, like Moses on the heights of Nebo, with the glorious vista of its future usefulness before him. Truly, can we say of him:

> Death makes no conquest of this conqueror;
> For now he lives in fame though not in life.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the death of Thomas A. Hendricks, Vice-President of the United States, aroused the sensibilities of the whole American people, and called forth an universal expression of regret and sorrow. The record of the life of an eminent citizen is a priceless legacy to his country, and the two Houses of Congress, in suspending for the time current affairs and placing in the archives of the nation a memorial of the public esteem in which such a record is held, give just expression to the sentiments of the people they represent and do honor to the Republic.

Thomas A. Hendricks was a native of Muskingum County, Ohio, born on the 7th of September, 1819, to which region his father had emigrated from Pennsylvania. While he was still but two or three years of age his father removed with his family to Madison, Ind., thence to a farm adjoining the then village of Shelbyville, in Shelby County, Indiana, near the center of the State, then an almost unbroken wilderness.

The Hendricks family has been more prominently identified with the history of Indiana than any other. As early as the year 1814 William Hendricks, uncle of the late Vice-President of the United States, became a citizen of the now beautiful city of Madison, on the Ohio River. He was the secretary of the first constitutional convention of Indiana and represented the State four terms in the House and two terms in the Senate of the United States with distinguished ability, and in the mean time was for a full term governor of the State.

I knew the father of Thomas A. Hendricks, a portly, dignified, unassuming gentleman, in faith a Presbyterian, who took a lively interest in matters of education and in the charitable institutions in his section of country—a plain, upright, honest man, a friend to every work of benevolence and charity. His circumstances were easy for that early period, when lands were cheap. The material condition and social life of these early pioneers was marked by general equality and republican simplicity—none were rich and none poor. It was a region gladened with streams of sparkling water, of fertile land covered with primeval forests from which the Indian but a few years before had sullenly turned his face to the west. These rich lands invited emigrants from Virginia, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, North Carolina, and other States, and soon became a prosperous community—each citizen the sturdy master of a freehold.

Here Thomas A. Hendricks, in a happy rural home, grew up to manhood with the advantages of early education common to a prosperous pioneer settlement. He engaged in a regular course of study at Hanover College, in Jefferson County, Indiana, one of the earliest of the great institutions of learning in the West, located on a magnificent elevation overlooking the waters of the Ohio, an institution under the auspices of the Presbyterian Church, which has always maintained a high standing, where many of the foremost men of Indiana have been educated, and graduated in 1841.

After graduating he at once entered upon the study of the law, and completed his studies in 1843 at Chambersburg, Pa., and entered upon the practice at Shelbyville, Ind. Two years later Mr. Hendricks was joined in marriage with Miss Eliza C. Morgan, of Ohio, a lady of rare and excellent qualities of mind and heart and of superior accomplishments, who became the close and constant companion of his life.

Mr. Hendricks rose steadily, but not rapidly, in his profession. The old neighbors took a lively interest in his advancement, and as early as 1848 he had acquired an honorable standing in the courts.

In that year he was elected a representative in the Legislature of Indiana, but I am not informed that in that service he added materially to his reputation. In 1850 he was elected a delegate to the constitutional convention of the State, which by a previous decision of the people was to convene at Indianapolis on the 7th day of October of that year. This convention presented a grand opportunity for a young man eager to enter the public service. It was as a member of this convention that Mr. Hendricks entered upon his public career. It was composed of one hundred and fifty delegates. Great importance was attached to it by the people. The Democratic party was greatly in the majority, but the Whigs were represented by an exceedingly able body of statesmen. Nearly all the men of both of the old parties in the State of established reputation were members—Robert Dale Owen, Michael G. Bright, John Pettit, Democrats; Governor David Wallace, James Rariden, Douglas McGuire, Whigs, with many others of both parties equally distinguished in national or State politics; while Thomas A. Hendricks, Schuyler Colfax, William McKee Dunn, Alvin G. Hovey, and others afterward distinguished in public life were of the younger members of the convention and not then generally known throughout the State.

In a convention so largely composed of old statesmen the young men came slowly to the front. Mr. Hendricks submitted few propositions and seldom addressed the convention; when he did it was on a question of recognized importance. As a speaker he was pleasant yet diffident and hesitating, his style clear and direct without any attempt at embellishment; but there was in his manner and language an expression of frankness, sincerity, and earnestness that always secured a respectful hearing. The strong, positive, and confident manner and style habitual to him in later years was not displayed in these earlier efforts.

The propositions he brought forward and the few addresses he delivered were characterized by modesty and good judgment, without the least attempt at display. But as a pleasant, cheerful, courteous, gentleman, Mr. Hendricks then displayed the excellent social qualities that so charmed his acquaintances and friends through all the subsequent years of his life. These qualities gathered friends around him, Whigs and Democrats alike, and long before the labors of that convention were completed he was recognized by men of both parties as one of the coming men of the State. He did not seem conscious of the interest growing around him, and I will never forget his look of pleased astonishment when, entering one evening the room we occupied in common, I told him a leading citizen of his district had just informed me he was to be the next candidate of his party in that district for Congress.

I know nothing more in harmony with the character of Mr. Hendricks as I knew it through a period of more than thirty-five years than a brief eulogy delivered by him on the 18th day of November, 1850, on the death of his venerable colleague in that convention, Mr. Vanbenthusen. After an appropriate reference to the history of his colleague, he concluded as follows:

> In all the relations of life he was a true man. As a member of the benevolent institutions of his county, in his political connections, as a citizen, and as a Christian, he was faithful to all of his espousals. To his order, his party, his country, and his faith, in their prosperity and adversity, their bright day and cloudy day, he was the same true brother, warm friend, zealous patriot, and unwearying Christian.

This proved to be an epitome of his own life. Shortly after the close of that convention in 1851 he was nominated by his political friends for Congress, and elected at the ensuing election. The capital district of Indiana was then, as ever since, noted for the number of its able men of both parties. The great Democratic leaders of that day in that district were men who had already acquired a national reputation—William J. Brown and W. W. Wick, who long served in this House, and others of recognized ability. The nomination of Mr. Hendricks on that occasion was simply an expression of the confidence of his political friends, which his prudent and manly deportment in that convention had inspired. By a change in the time of the Congressional election in Indiana, Mr. Hendricks was re-elected to Congress in 1852, and two years later was again nominated by his political friends with great unanimity. Here he encountered that remarkable political episode, that cyclone in politics as un-American as a sand-storm in the Lybian desert, generally known as the American party. Judging from the subsequent life of Mr. Hendricks there was not a man in America, less likely to bend to that storm than himself, and he and most of his political associates went down before the blind but momentary fury of the blast.

Leaving Congress in 1855, without solicitation he was appointed by the President of the United States Commissioner of the General Land Office, a bureau then as now of greater importance, in view of the far-reaching interests involved, than any other under the Federal Government. I do not claim that during the period of his service in this House or while he performed, as he did, with unwearying vigilance and admirable judgment the duties of Commissioner of the General Land Office he attracted in a large degree the attention of the people of the United States, but as far as his reputation extended in the fulfillment of the duties of those employments it was impressed upon the public mind that he was a gentleman of excellent judgment, conservative views, of great capacity in affairs, and of unyielding integrity of purpose. These qualities naturally arrested more attention in his own State than in the country at large.

In 1860 he was nominated by his party for governor of Indiana. Hon. Henry S. Lane, who had previously served in this House and afterwards in the Senate, a distinguished Whig in the old school of politics, a Republican in the new, was his opponent. The canvass was of unusual interest, but did not materially affect the result. The great underlying political current of the period—antagonism to slavery—which set all party schemes at defiance, mastered results. Mr. Hendricks was defeated. In the political revolution of 1862 in Indiana he became completely in his State the master of the situation, and was elected to the Senate of the United States with the absolute unanimity of his political friends, and took his seat in that body on the 4th of March, 1863.

Mr. Hendricks's service in the Senate covers the most important period of the war and the period of reconstruction. It was in this service he gained in a large degree the confidence of his party in the nation that he had long possessed in his State. He never at any moment from the first gun of the war of the rebellion to the last faltered in his faith that the Union of the States would be maintained. He never uttered a word in justification or excuse of the fratricidal policy that sought to destroy the Union. He never as Senator failed in his support of the measures deemed necessary by the administration of the Government to restore and maintain the integrity of the Union. Before the war he had stood up against the fierce political forces which were inciting war between the two sections of the Union, for he believed that the underlying cause of the impending conflict—African slavery—could be removed without an appeal to arms. He deplored the ultimate results of intestine war, but I am absolutely safe in asserting that neither as a citizen nor as a Senator of the United States did Thomas A. Hendricks ever utter one word or perform a single act that was not perfectly loyal to the Union of the States, or as Senator hesitate to support any measure deemed necessary for its maintenance.

The great speeches of Mr. Hendricks are to be found in the debates in the Senate over the measures of reconstruction. I will not attempt to recall them. They are a part of the history of the country. They were the result of his mature convictions. He held that the war of the rebellion had not dissolved the Union or changed the relations of any of the States to the Federal Government, or enlarged the powers of Congress. His conduct and deportment during this period, and the ability he displayed, challenged the respect of his political opponents, for none doubted the sincerity and integrity of his motives.

His reputation rests safely on the powerful arguments he submitted against the measures of reconstruction from the stand of his convictions of public duty.

We are, perhaps, too near the fierce fires of that conflict to pronounce an impartial judgment on the political theories of the period, especially as to the measures of reconstruction, but of the high and patriotic motives that inspired the action of Mr. Hendricks during that period his friends are confident no question will be made when impartial history shall be written. During the period of reconstruction and the impeachment of President Johnson, Mr. Hendricks was recognized as the greatest representative of his party in the Senate, and I am sure that party is satisfied with the record he made.

While Mr. Hendricks was in the Senate the Presidential contest of 1868 occurred. A widespread sentiment existed among Democrats that Mr. Hendricks should be their candidate for the Presidency. There were strong indications of such a result. The underlying forces incident to a great convention determined otherwise, but it is reasonably certain that Democratic opinion throughout the country demanded the nomination of Mr. Hendricks for the Presidency by that convention. It was, at least, not an improbable event. During that convention, and while the great issue was in suspense but promising an early decision, I was walking with Mr. Hendricks in the garden west of the Capitol. Messages came to him from a friend in the convention in New York at short intervals. The prospects, combinations, changes, speculations as to the result were reported from hour to hour in endless succession, almost bringing with them the throbbing tumult of the great assemblage. In the midst of all this Mr. Hendricks talked on in his cheerful, pleasant way, unmoved by the stirring reports, neither buoyant under seeming advantage nor despondent under defeat. His deportment filled me with admiration, and I said to myself this is the grandest character of them all. In 1868 he was again the candidate of his party for governor, but was again defeated. It is interesting to note that every nomination of Mr. Hendricks for office after 1851 was by the unanimous action of his party and that every successive defeat secured to him the higher confidence and greater devotion of his political friends.

In 1872, after a contest of unexampled interest, he was elected governor of Indiana and served the full term.

He was nominated greatly against his will, and finally, under the earnest and persistent importunities of his political friends, accepted the nomination of his party for Vice-President in 1876, with Mr. Tilden as candidate for President. His acceptance of this nomination more than any other act of his life exemplified his devotion to his party, the ultimate triumph of whose principles he believed to be of the highest importance to the public safety. He did not wish the nomination for Vice-President. He did not wish the office. A large body of his political and personal friends were dissatisfied with the action of the convention, believing that he was the choice of his party for the Presidency. Yet he accepted the nomination. I need not speak of the result of that Presidential contest.

In 1884 Mr. Hendricks was nominated for Vice-President at the Democratic national convention at Chicago after the nomination of Mr. Cleveland for President. It is true to history to say that Mr. Hendricks wished at that time the renomination of the old ticket of 1876—Tilden and Hendricks. He believed at the outset that Mr. Tilden would accept, if it was tendered to him, the nomination for the Presidency. When it was clear that Mr. Tilden would not, his personal relations with that contest ceased. He did not expect the nomination for President or desire the nomination for Vice-President. He did not over look or underestimate the strength of his friends in all sections of the Union, but he understood fully the effect of the position he assumed in 1880, when he peremptorily refused in advance a nomination for the Vice-Presidency, and the antagonism in which it placed him with the great political forces of the East. Hence, when even by an overmastering acclamation he was called upon to accept the nomination for Vice-President he reluctantly yielded to the demand. He did not feel that entire justice had been done to that great body of his party which had for years desired his nomination for the Presidency. He felt that great political forces were for the time unfriendly to the nomination of a citizen to that high office in the section of the Union of which he was the recognized representative. He had indulged, upon just grounds and with ample reason, aspirations to the greatest office in his country, but he now felt that fortune had decided against him. But he had been too long a living force in the Democratic party to contemplate its future without being identified with its fortunes. And more than this, while the majority of the delegates had decided that the interests of the party demanded the nomination for the Presidency of a citizen of a great Eastern State, yet the unexampled enthusiasm displayed when he appeared in the convention and when his own name was finally and unexpectedly to him mentioned for the second office, left no doubt of his strong hold on the confidence and affections of his party. No human being could have resisted such an ovation, and Grover Cleveland and Thomas A. Hendricks were respectively elected President and Vice-President of the United States.

And here I pause, except to consider the question that may be suggested touching the place Thomas A. Hendricks ought to occupy in history. It is said that he was never specially identified with any great and distinctive measure of public policy. This is perhaps true as to the initiation of any such measure. But is it true that the quality of greatness in an American statesman can only arise incidentally from his association with a measure of government of special importance or of great results? Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, James Madison, and their associates, founders of this Republic, in the opinion of their countrymen and in the current judgment of the world stand alone in statemanship. Webster and Chief-Justice Marshall will, for all time, be associated, but from different standpoints, with the struggle which defined the powers and established the supremacy of the Federal Union and the local sovereignty of the States. Mr. Monroe, with the American doctrine that European powers should not intervene in the political affairs of this continent; Mr. Douglas, with the masterly, yet necessarily abortive, effort to postpone the issue of African slavery, which irresistible forces were pressing upon the country, and Mr. Lincoln, with the final abolition of African slavery. These and, perhaps, a few other instances can be named, since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, where, in the public judgment, the reputation of a citizen, recognized as one of the great men of the Republic, is indissolubly united with a great public measure, yet in each instance the prominent feature of public policy named was but an incident in the record of the statesman. I have spoken only of statesmen, not citizens who have become great by the successful command of armies.

Successive generations of men, since the formation of this Government, have remarked with astonishment its wonderful adaptability alike to the small community for which it was formed as to more and more enlarged and powerful communities, until it extends over and embraces a commonwealth which in intelligence, numbers, community of interest, prosperity, and possessions stands the first on the globe. From this standpoint statesmanship in the United States is to be considered, for to the natural cause of fertile lands and salubrious climate, combined with a system of government of unexampled goodness, the remarkable result must be attributed. To maintain this system of government in its complete and perfect vigor has been the highest duty of American statesmanship from the beginning.

Hence the study of American history reveals the fact that comparatively few of the recognized great men of the Republic have secured that exalted standing in the public judgment by being specially identified with a great public measure, especially a measure proven great and valuable by the test of experience. Great and permanent measures of government are seldom the result of the wisdom and foresight of a single statesman. Consider the present monetary system of the United States, so generally in its leading features satisfactory. No statesman, living or dead, is specially in the public judgment entitled to credit for it. It grew up and acquired form and character through countless industrial, commercial, and political forces. It is simply the outgrowth of the conflicts of opinion in public and private affairs and in the exigencies of government, and the same is true of most of the great measures of legislation.

Accepting, then, our system of government, as nearly a century has demonstrated, as perfect as human wisdom could devise, considering the value of fixed and permanent institutions and the forces always at work, generally by indirection, to remold and warp those institutions in the advancement of party or of great special interests, it must be admitted that conservative forces, conservative statesmanship, are of the highest value. Yet it is obvious that in a great government like ours, occupying a large space and a commanding position in the most favored portion of the globe, powerful and not unfrequently conflicting forces will arise which can not be ignored—interests strong enough to command a hearing. In this view I submit that a broad and comprehensive conservatism in statesmanship that takes all these forces as they arise into the account, and yet maintains with unfaltering fortitude the essential principles which underlie our system of government, the ancient land-marks of our republican institutions, is the quality of statesmanship which ought to hold, under all conditions, in the largest degree the confidence of the American people. A statesman controlled by such views and possessed of great powers to maintain and uphold them is sure to arrest the attention and secure the confidence of his countrymen.

Such a statesman was Thomas A. Hendricks, and such was his view of the duties of American statesmanship. He was not in the ordinary sense of the term a reformer. He sought to maintain in their severe simplicity the institutions of our Government. He took into the account always the greatness of his country and sought to maintain its free institutions in their full strength and vigor. He considered the general result, but was, I think, at times too indifferent to the details of administration, which necessarily beget antagonisms. He indulged an exalted pride in his country and its institutions, and viewed with alarm and questioned with remorseless severity any measure of policy that from his standpoint imperiled or seemed to imperil the safety of the land-marks set up by the fathers.

He was a disciple of Thomas Jefferson and an admirer of James Madison, whom he greatly resembled in the general outlines of his character, scope of views of public measures, and theories of government.

He was not overcautious in politics, but a man of high moral courage. Let him who doubts this read the debates in the Senate in that grave and anxious period when the measures of reconstruction were under consideration; let him consider the approval by Mr. Hendricks at a later period, as governor of Indiana, of the temperance measure known as the Baxter law, against which the fierce hostility of his political friends was aroused, indignantly refusing at the time a word of apology or excuse.

I admit, for I am anxious to delineate his character with truth, that he was a partisan in the sense of firm and unyielding devotion to the fortunes of his party. From his early youth to the close of his life he was a Democrat and only confident of the future of his country in the supremacy in the public councils of Government of the views of constitutional power under the Federal system taught by the early statesmen whose views were generally accepted by the Democratic party. For forty-five years he adhered to the fortunes of that party without "variableness or shadow of turning." He never for one moment lost faith in his party or in his own convictions of public policy. But he was always courteous, just, and fair to his political adversaries. He was thoroughly practical in his political views, and never lost sight of the main purpose and necessity of political organizations as great and responsible agencies for the administration of a Government of the people.

To the temporary and incidental questions which spring up in periods of public disorder he attached no importance. As long as the fundamental principles of his party were secure he made no question on temporary abstractions. He had positive convictions on the tariff prior to 1861. He believed that the freedom of commerce would break down the barriers between the nations, stimulate industry in all quarters of the globe, and promote closer and more peaceful relations between all parts of the human race; but when a great public debt demanded great revenues, he believed that the great question of tariff reform had been postponed until the current ordinary expenses of Government should in the main make demands on the Treasury. He believed that the monetary system of the Government, disordered by the exactions of war, could only be restored to its normal condition and to its proper relations to other commercial powers by the progress of current and natural events; that in such cases time, patience, and labor are the lawmakers. I mention these matters only to illustrate his thoroughly practical views of political questions.

On subjects which he believed for the time to be beyond the reach of practical and effective legislation Mr. Hendricks generally remained silent or gave a formal assent to the action of his party, but refused to discuss them, as not of practical interest; hence some of his cotemporaries have inconsiderately charged him with a want of defined policy in public affairs. But my answer is that whenever definite views were important he expressed them, and when courage was demanded Thomas A. Hendricks never hesitated even when his own party was the assailant.

Mr. Hendricks was a laborious and patient student. He had the scholarly attainments of a well-informed American gentleman. He had mastered the leading measures of policy and the great questions of constitutional power which had from time to time arisen in the progress of our history. He understood in all their details the current political questions of the period; yet I do not think that during the last few years he liked the drudgery of study except where the labor was demanded by the occasion or was relieved by his intellectual enjoyment of the subject. He was undoubtedly one of the greatest lawyers this country has produced, notwithstanding the large portion of his life devoted to public affairs. He was familiar with the current literature of the age and greatly enjoyed the works of an author whose style was elegant and vivacious and at the same time instructive. He enjoyed society, and mingled with remarkable ease and cordiality in the social circle and in the midst of great bodies of men. He was fond of manly amusements, especially in early life, but never under circumstances where the propriety of the presence of a gentleman could be called in question.

When Mr. Hendricks first entered public life he did not give special promise of becoming a great speaker, yet his manner was attractive. His clear, kindly eye and the bright, frank, and manly expression of his face won the confidence of his audience in the beginning, and while in some degree hesitating in manner, his clear, direct, and logical style and uniform good sense commanded attention. As time advanced he became a great master in the field of oratory. His manner became dignified, his style elevated, polished, and commanding, and in later years it can be claimed, without partiality, that in elevation of thought, clearness of statement, and vigor of expression and in the magical powers that charm and convince an audience his speeches compare well with those of the ablest statesmen the country has produced.

Left to himself, he enjoyed above all else the congenial society of his accomplished wife and the presence of his friends at his own fireside. Here at home the man great in the rugged current of business and affairs became still greater in the genial, confiding, generous qualities of mind and heart that diffused sunshine and gladness around him and made him the idol of his friends. I recall how, in his manhood, with the filial affection of a boy, he greeted his venerable father after a short separation, and the anxious inquiries for the mother at home. At the time I speak of he was still residing at his early home, but was long detained by the convention I have mentioned at the State capital; and I shall never forget how joyfully he anticipated an occasional visit from his young wife and little boy. The little boy, a child of remarkable sprightliness, his only offspring, died more than thirty years ago, yet seemed to live as a part of his own life. We have seldom met during all these years when he did not recall some childish remark of his little boy. His heart was instantly touched by any instance of poverty or suffering, and, without hesitation, was eager to furnish relief.

His devotion to his friends never faltered. The last words he spoke to me in this Capitol, just before he left it never to return, were of anxious solicitude for a friend. A little later, in the capital of our State, at his own fireside, as I left him to see him in this life no more, I shall never forget the earnest pressure of his hand as he bade me farewell with the earnest hope that he should be able to aid in advancing the fortunes of an old friend then present. This generous and always sincere interest in his friends was a notable feature of his character.

In the relations that gather around the fireside of home, and in the impulses and affections that live in the sanctuary of the heart, this great strong man who stood up so sturdily in the rough struggles of men displayed the tenderness of a gentle woman.

It was this part of the life of Mr. Hendricks that most charmed those who knew him well and enjoyed his friendship. His great abilities inspired their admiration, but the kindness and generosity habitual to his life won their love and affection.

He accepted with a sturdy old-fashioned belief, without doubt or hesitation, the Old Testament and the New. This unfaltering faith unquestionably gave him that marked stability of character so conspicuous in his career. But, more than this, early in life he had laid up in his heart, never to lose its power, the sublime lesson of the sweetest words that ever fell on the ear of mortal—the divine sentiment which even in the midst of affliction and sorrow lights up the soul with rays of consolation and hope—"Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

Who shall say that in the last moment, when the celestial messenger came to his peaceful home unannounced, and touched the great human heart and bade it rest forever, the acts of kindly beneficence, the sweet charities of a good life, were not transformed into rays of living light, illuminating to the freed spirit the pathway to the realm of the infinite and immortal!

He was a pure man, a born gentleman. Thirty-five years ago Mr. Hendricks and myself occupied a room in common at our State capital for many months, and through all the succeeding years up to the time of his death our relations were those of close and intimate friendship, and it affords me the highest gratification to be able to say that through all those years I never heard a word fall from his lips, in jest or otherwise, that might not have been spoken, without a thought of offense, in the presence of the purest woman.

It is hardly necessary to speak of the personal integrity of such a man; yet I will add that through all these years of public employment, as member of the General Assembly of Indiana and its constitutional convention, Representative in Congress, Commissioner of the General Land Office, a great public trust, Senator in the Senate of the United States, governor of Indiana, Vice-President of the United States, embracing a period of unexampled bitterness in political contests, in all of which he was engaged as an unyielding yet courteous partisan, I am not aware that a single human being ever called his integrity in question.

Late in September last Mr. Hendricks left this capital with a view of attending a reunion of the surviving members of the constitutional convention of Indiana, who had separated thirty-five years before, and of the first General Assembly held under the provisions of the new constitution, which was charged with the duty of carrying into effect the reforms inaugurated by the convention. The meeting was to be held on the 5th and 6th of October. Hon. W. H. English, who was chief secretary of the convention and speaker of that first General Assembly, had taken great interest in making this reunion of early Indiana legislators a memorable event. The admirable result of the labor of those bodies, tested by thirty-five years of experience, was the occasion of this reunion. On the 5th of October, when the roll of 150 members of the convention was called, only 33 were found to be living. When Mr. Hendricks appeared on the platform, on the 5th of October, in the midst of these associates of his early public life, he received a most cordial greeting. Republicans and Democrats alike gathered around him; political antagonisms melted away in the presence of generous friendship; moistened eyes told too well how much stronger the affections of the heart are than the ties of party or the intellectual convictions of a life. But it was the subdued greeting of men looking backward to see what had been accomplished—not forward in the mighty and mysterious energy of hope!

On that evening Mr. Hendricks addressed his old associates. He stood before his audience erect and stately as if in his prime. His attitude and bearing were as composed and self-reliant as in former years. His face bore in every lineament the old cheerful, frank, kindly expression. The address was an elegant and comprehensive statement of the great reforms which had been accomplished by the two bodies, the surviving remnants of which were before him. He closed the address with these words:

The Constitution then adopted stands almost without change or modification after thirty-five years. Under its provisions the people have maintained local self-government in its highest excellence. In peace and in war it has guarded their rights, protected their interests, and promoted their welfare and prosperity. I congratulate you who are living, and I honor the memory of the delegates who are dead for the perfect work done by the convention.

This reunion and the relation of Mr. Hendricks to it was a pleasing incident well worthy of the closing period of a great and good life, men of all parties, associates of his early manhood who saw the opening promise of his powers, laying aside the animosities of party and meeting him in the embrace of friendship, as if for a final parting.

Alas! how soon in the midst of emblems of a nation's grief and in the presence of the representatives of its great departments, he was laid away to his final rest, while a vast multitude of those who had known and loved him for so many years, unmindful that the dead statesman held the second office in the gift of the foremost nation of the globe, came with sad hearts to drop a tear on the grave of a friend!

The reputation of Thomas A. Hendricks reposes in safety on a sure foundation. A gentleman without blemish, a generous and true friend, an eminent lawyer, an accomplished orator, a great statesman, a devoted friend to his country, a sincere Christian, an honest man!

This is the epitaph which the great Commonwealth which knew and loved him best rests assured will delineate his character on the record of imperishable history.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. HOLMAN were then unanimously adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who have spoken on this occasion and desire to extend their remarks in the RECORD may have leave to do so, and also that leave be granted to other gentlemen who desire to print remarks on the death of the late Vice-President.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution coming over under objection from yesterday, which will now be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Executive of the United States is not restricted by Constitution or law in removing or suspending appointees; that the Senate has no constitutional right to require that reasons shall be given for such removals or suspensions; but that it is the right of the Senate to call for any papers relating to the conduct of removed or suspended appointees or to the qualification and fitness of all persons whose names are presented to the Senate for confirmation or rejection, and it is the duty of the Executive to comply with all demands for the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] offered a substitute for the resolution, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed substitute, as follows:

Resolved, 1. That "the executive power" is expressly "vested" by the Constitution "in the President" of the United States, so that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

2. That the power of appointment to Federal office is an executive power, to be exercised by the President under the limitation in the Constitution that "he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint."

3. That the power of removal or suspension from the powers and duties of Federal office is also an executive power, vested exclusively in the President, without any such limitation in the Constitution as is imposed thereby on the power of appointment, and for its exercise he is responsible alone to the people, and not to the Senate.

4. That the right of the President to make nominations to the Senate, and of the Senate to advise and consent thereto, are each separate and independent rights, to be exercised by the President and Senate respectively and separately and independently within their absolute discretion; but in relation to the person or persons so nominated the Senate may request information of the President affecting the character or qualifications of those as to whose appointment he asks the advice and consent of the Senate.

5. That when the President makes nominations to the Senate of persons to be appointed by him to exercise the powers and duties of Federal officers who have been removed or suspended by him, no law, public duty, or public policy requires that he shall send or communicate to the Senate any cause, reason, or information within his own knowledge, or contained in any letters, petitions, papers, or documents addressed to him or any member of his Cabinet, or in the possession of either and relating to the subject of removals or suspensions, or containing charges, causes, or reasons, and the proof thereof, for making such removals or suspensions, and no law, public duty, or public policy requires or authorizes the Senate to call for such information existing in any such form from the President or any member of his Cabinet to enable the Senate to review or question the action of the President in exercising his executive, discretionary, and exclusive power of removing or suspending Federal officers from the powers and duties of their office, or to put the President on trial by the Senate, or to enforce accountability to the Senate for anything he may have done in the exercise of such jurisdiction.

6. That to obtain information considered by either House of Congress useful in passing necessary and proper laws, either House of Congress may request the President, if not deemed by him incompatible with the public interest, to give any information within his own knowledge, or contained in any public documents or records on file or in the lawful custody of any of the Departments and relating to the administration of any public office or the official conduct or acts affecting the official conduct or duties of any public officer; but for the Senate to make such request of the President, or to direct any member of his Cabinet to transmit to the Senate any information or any public documents or other papers in open or executive session to enable the Senate in open or executive session to review the propriety or the cause or the information upon which he acted or may have acted in making removals or suspensions, would be an attempt to obtain such information by false pretenses and for uses and purposes not authorized or justified by any law or public policy of the United States; and should the President grant such request or require any member of his Cabinet to obey such direction from the Senate when deemed by him to have been made for such unjustifiable and unlawful uses and purposes, would be to recognize and encourage an improper practice and a dangerous innovation upon his exclusive and independent rights, powers, and duties as President of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, two months of the session have now gone by and there are not more than four months that ought to be left for doing the practical business of the Senate. These resolutions present purely moot questions. When they shall arise, if they ever do, as practical questions on any action of the President of the United States that the Senate deems it proper to express any opinion about, it will be time enough to deal with them. No such practical question now exists, and I move to lay the resolution and the amendment on the table.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I reckon there is no point better understood in parliamentary bodies than that——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I was going to make the point, if you please, sir (I knew the question was not debatable), that there is no point better understood than that a Senator can not first make remarks and then make a motion which is not debatable. The Senator from Vermont made his remarks first and concluded with his motion. If the motion which he made was not debatable, then how could he have debated it first? That is laid down in the books, and I apprehend that it is just the situation here. I ask the Chair now whether the resolutions are not before the Senate just as though the Senator from Vermont had said nothing and had made no motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is bound to hold that the resolutions are before the Senate, but that they are before the Senate on a motion to lay them on the table.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I have the floor, I presume?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to lay on the table is not debatable. Until that question is disposed of the resolutions can not be debated under the rule.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I did not hear the Chair.

Mr. HALE. I hope that unanimous consent will be given to the Senator from Virginia, who introduced the resolution, to briefly reply to the Senator from Vermont who has moved to lay the matter on the table, and after that we can have a vote under the rules of the Senate, but I do not think the Senator from Virginia should be excluded from a brief presentation in reply to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If it be in order—and I think it is—to make another motion that will enable the Senator from Virginia to proceed as of right, I appeal from the decision of the Chair. That, I believe, will be debatable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not on a motion to lay on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that an appeal from the decision of the Chair on a motion to lay on the table would not be debatable.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, so that the Senator from Virginia may proceed in order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg pardon, I think it can be corrected under the rules of the Senate. I prefer to correct it under the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the Senator from Virginia shall have leave to reply and debate the question. If there be no objection it will be understood that consent is given.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I did not hear one word that the Senator from Vermont uttered, except when he said something about laying the resolution upon the table, which had been prefaced by certain remarks; I did not hear the remarks; I do not know now what he said; I do not know whether he is friendly or unfriendly to the resolution; but I do know that it is the rule in all parliamentary bodies that an undebatable motion shall be made without remarks preceding it.

I do know that; and on that theory I proceed to state only and again, that my object in introducing the resolution was to bring this practical question before the country, and not to keep it shut up here in some sort of a secret or executive session, as I believe it is called.

I am not trying to change any rule. I have no idea of doing so. I am not trying to change any custom. I have no hope that I can do that. But here are two resolutions introduced, each for the same purpose, I take it, to get at the sense of the Senate as to what is the right of the Senate in asking for or demanding information from the President in respect to his removals and demanding information from him in respect to his appointments. I separate the two in my resolution; and I now ask that if the Senate is ready to proceed in open session to consider a question which is before the whole country, it will hear the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] on his own substitute.

The substitute, I understand, is to be voted upon first. I never knew anything to the contrary. If I am mistaken in that, I am mistaken in my whole idea of what is to transpire here to-day or of what ought to transpire here to-day. If I offer a resolution and some Senator shall offer a substitute for it, the substitute is to be voted upon first; and if the Senator from Alabama does not want his substitute spoken to either by himself or others, I ask that we shall take a vote on the two propositions as they appear here to-day.

I do not deny anything in the first three paragraphs of the Senator's substitute. It begins:

Resolved, (1) That "the executive power" is expressly "vested" by the Constitution "in the President" of the United States, so that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

I do not think any Senator here will deny that. I do not deny this axiom:

(2) That the power of appointment to Federal office is an executive power, to be exercised by the President under the limitation in the Constitution that "he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint."

I do not think any Senator can take any exception to that. Next:

(3) That the power of removal or suspension from the powers and duties of Federal office is also an executive power, vested exclusively in the President, without any such limitation in the Constitution as is imposed thereby on the power of appointment, and for its exercise he is responsible alone to the people and not to the Senate.

If the Senator from Alabama will take those first three paragraphs of his resolution and introduce them this morning as a substitute for mine of yesterday I will accept them; but when it comes to the rest of the substitute, that there is no public interest involved, that is another question outside of the Constitution, and I ask that the Senator from Alabama shall give us some reasons this morning, if he can do so—and I take it for granted that he can—why we should adopt his substitute for the resolution which I offered yesterday, mine involving only two propositions, namely, that we have no right to require of the President reasons for the removal or suspension of any officer, but that we have a right to require and demand of him any reasons or any paper or any proofs going to the question of appointments to office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. PUGH. I confess to a very large amount of ignorance of parliamentary law, and I desire to be informed if a motion to lay on the table is not always made to cut off debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has the effect to cut off debate. Whether it is made for that purpose it is not for the Chair to say.

Mr. PUGH. I simply desire the privilege of stating in a sentence that I never would have offered my resolution as a substitute if the question had not been presented in open Senate by a leading Republican on the other side.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. PUGH. My resolutions were responsive to affirmative action, as I understood, on the part of the Republican side of the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan rises to a point of order. The Senator from Alabama will pause for a moment. The Senator from Michigan will please state his question of order.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that if this matter is to be open to debate, by consent or otherwise, it must be open to all, and if it is not to be open to general debate now under the motion to lay on the table, I object to any further discussion upon the subject. I have some remarks to make myself whenever the opportunity comes under the rule.

Mr. PUGH. As the motion has been made to lay the resolutions on the table, and as the purpose of the motion is manifest, I have no objection to the motion prevailing.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have no objection to the motion if the Senator from Vermont will make the motion without any prefatory remarks, because a motion that is not debatable can not be made at the end of a speech. If the Senator from Vermont will rise and move to lay the resolutions on the table, I am entirely willing that it shall be done until it suits the convenience of the Senate to discuss them in open session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind Senators that the question is not debatable. It is always unpleasant for the Chair to interfere and remind Senators of the rule.

Mr. COCKRELL and others. Let us vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay the resolutions on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF TEMPERANCE EDUCATION ARGUMENTS.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask an order of the Senate for printing the notes of a hearing before the Committee on Education and Labor on Senate bill No. 797. I ask that 1,000 copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire presents notes of an interview or examination of witnesses, perhaps, before the Committee on Education and Labor, and asks for an order to print 1,000 copies. Is there objection?

Mr. MCMILLAN. What is it?

Mr. HOAR. I do not suppose there is any objection to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to know what that interview is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the paper sent to the Chair by the Senator from New Hampshire will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. "Notes of a hearing before the Committee on Education and Labor, January 29, 1886, on the bill (S. 797) to provide for the study of physiology and hygiene, and the effect of intoxicating, narcotic, and poisonous substances upon the life, health, and welfare, by the pupils in the public schools of the Territories and of the District of Columbia and in the Military and Naval Academies."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that 1,000 copies of these notes be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Were those notes taken by order of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not able to advise the Senator.

Mr. MANDERSON. I submit that under the rules and under the statute the motion to print must be referred to the Committee on Printing for an estimate of the cost, unless the Senator from New Hampshire can state what the cost will be.

Mr. BLAIR. This was a hearing before the Committee on Education and Labor, occupying a part of one forenoon, perhaps an hour and a half, by delegations from different quarters, representing the District of Columbia, and representing those who desire the passage of the bill in the country at large. As it is a new bill, a new idea in national legislation, and was urged with much earnestness and with the presentation of a great deal of new and interesting matter, it seemed to me that it would be proper that these minutes, the printing of which can not be costly, which may not cost more than $20 or $30, would be very profitable for the use of the Senate, and I ask it, as is very usual in such a case.

Mr. MORGAN. I would very much rather vote the amount of money that is required for the printing to bring to the attention of the country some old ideas that belong necessarily to the history and policy of the country rather than to be experimenting upon the dissemination of what the Senator terms a new idea. Unless the Senate has ordered this to be done, I think we are setting a rather bad example.

There are frequent occasions when I have thought that interviews and statements made before committees of this body would be beneficial to the public service, but I had not dared to ask the Senate to print them, because they were taken by the committee, ex mero motu, without any previous instruction or order from the Senate. If the Committee on Education and Labor had come here with a report that they thought it necessary to have this new idea developed by an interview before their body or by an examination, then we should have had a chance to have understood something about what the purpose of it was.

We can not know what is in that paper unless it is all read. The Senate has had no consideration of the question at all; has had no opportunity to consider it. I shall therefore object to the order to print being adopted, at least until it goes to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I will move that the matter be sent to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think the Senator from Alabama can have understood what is asked. This matter was referred to a committee of the Senate raised to consider that general subject. They have taken some testimony, as I understand, and they ask that it may be printed, saying that it is so short that it can not cost more than $20 or $30 to print it. It seems to me that of course the Senate would grant such a request out of courtesy to an individual Senator, much more to a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Alabama to move that the question be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I do not think there is any necessity for referring it, and I do not understand that the rules send it there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules do not.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. It has been customary in this body, and it certainly is in the other branch of Congress, that hearings before committees may be printed on the order of the chairman. I do not think the chairman of the committee need have asked for the order to print; but he has done so, and certainly the right should be extended to him. I listened to the hearing myself, and I can vouch that it is a valuable paper and should be printed and laid on our tables.

Mr. HOAR. A committee may direct any one of its members to report for the information of the Senate a matter that has been laid before it, and then it is printed as a matter of course under the rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no trouble about it.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the reading of the paper.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the paper being called for and objection being made, the question is Shall the paper be read?

Mr. MORGAN. Upon that question I desire to say a word.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not debatable.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senate is now about to order the printing of a paper in respect to which it knows not one word except a statement of the general character of it coming from a member of the committee. I do not know whether it is beneficial to the public service that it should be read, that it should be understood by the Senate. I do not know what it contains. I do not know whether when we have found it before the Senate it will need to be contradicted or answered. I think, sir, that it is crowding matters a little bit too fast for any Senator upon a committee, though he is chairman of it——

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I remind my friend from Alabama that I believe such a question, whether a paper shall be read, is not debatable?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know any rule against it. I am not quite as familiar with the rules as the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very sure there is a rule of that kind. I am sure there ought to be.

Mr. INGALLS. There is a positive rule on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will read a portion of the eleventh rule:

> When the reading of a paper is called for, and objected to, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, without debate.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Chair will allow me, I make the point of order that that means a paper of which the Senate has been put in possession under its rules. It does not mean a paper that I may get up here and offer—for instance, a matter of private correspondence between me and other persons; but it refers to some paper that has come into the possession of the Senate under its rules. This paper is not in the possession of the Senate under its rules, as I believe.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the Senator has not any right to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the rule extends to any paper proposed to be read. The reading being objected to, the question is, Shall the paper be read to the Senate? [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it. The noes have it. The question now is on the order to print 1,000 copies.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the paper?

Mr. MORGAN. We are never to find out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the order be made to print 1,000 copies of the paper?

Mr. HARRIS. My inquiry was as to what the paper is. I have been inattentive; it has been altogether my own fault.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is some evidence reported from the Committee on Education and Labor—things we do every day without the slightest objection.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire why it does not go to the Committee on Printing in the ordinary way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Because it is not a provision for extra copies, and is the ordinary report of a committee. That is all there is about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that this paper does not come within the rule requiring a reference to the Committee on Printing. The Senator from Alabama demands the yeas and nays on the motion to print.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BECK. I understand the question is whether the Senate shall be allowed to know what we are doing.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the question.

Mr. BECK. That is all. I do not know what the paper is, and I want to know. I may vote for printing it, but I should like to know what it is, and the question is whether we shall know or not, I understand.

Mr. BLAIR. I will state to the Senate just what it is. A bill was introduced into the Senate, and also into the other House, providing for the introduction of the study of the nature and effects of alcohol upon the human system as one of the branches of common-school study, along with other departments of the study of physiology and hygiene, the bill providing for the introduction of that study in the schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories and the Military and Naval Academies. It was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. Parties applied to that committee to be heard.

Mr. MORGAN. Who were they?

Mr. BLAIR. They applied to be heard in favor of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator name the parties?

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will permit me to occupy a portion of the time——

Mr. MORGAN. I merely desire the information.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall try to give the Senator the information.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely put the question to the Senator as to who the parties were.

Mr. BLAIR. One lady appeared before the committee——

Mr. MORGAN. I thought so.

Mr. BLAIR. A lady representing the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the country, and also representing various other temperance societies, organizations, and individuals who desire the passage of the bill, which is a bill that has already been enacted in fourteen States of the Union, and was never opposed, so far as I know, by a party vote in any State. It is the law in the Senator's own State of Alabama, a bill the same in substance with this measure. It is the law in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Michigan, Wisconsin, I think Colorado, and in all in fourteen States of the Union, North and South.

This lady has been perhaps more than any other one individual instrumental in securing the passage of these bills. She has been to the Legislatures of nearly or quite all these States, and in many of them the bill has been passed with substantial unanimity, never so far as I know, as I said before, with any essential opposition anywhere, at least not after a full hearing and discussion of the bill, which is simply one providing that the children of this country shall know something about the nature of alcohol when they are first tempted to take it as a drink.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator tell us now what the paper is?

Mr. BLAIR. I am telling the Senator. This lady appeared in advocacy of the bill. She made a speech of about one hour's duration, in which she stated the facts that have come to her knowledge which seem to demand the enactment of a law of this kind wherever Congress has jurisdiction over the schools of the country.

Mr. BECK. Is it the object to print that speech?

Mr. BLAIR. Her speech, full of facts and full of argument, is a portion of the minutes which I now desire to have printed for the use of the committee and the Senate, the bill still being under consideration by the committee.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to that. I did not know what it was.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from New Hampshire will permit me to say that this lady, I think, is a lady of Massachusetts; at any rate she is a lady who has addressed public audiences there, and is a lady of very high character and ability.

Mr. BLAIR. She is a lady who has been identified with the cause of education all her life. She has had charge of schools of importance herself, and for quite a number of years has devoted herself without money and without price to the prosecution of this work. She preached last Sabbath in the Metropolitan church of this city, she has discoursed all over the country on the subject, and I have scarce ever heard a more forcible address upon any subject than the address which this lady delivered before the committee and also last Sabbath in church.

It is very valuable matter. It is not verbose, but matter of fact, terse, and to the point, and will do good to the Senate to read it; at least I believe so.

The other matter which went to make up the hearing came from eminent clergymen who are residents of this city and who came as delegates from the District of Columbia to urge the passage of the bill. I do not refer to the commissioners of the District, nor to those who advocate and establish the grog-shops of the city, and who are generally identified with the liquor traffic of this city or of the country, but I refer to that conservative and religious and important class of this community who desire the passage of the bill.

As the whole time occupied was not over an hour and a half, I do not think I understate the cost of the printing when I say it will be something between $20 and $30. I may be wrong; perhaps it will be fifty or a hundred dollars, I do not know; but I have stated as fully as I can what the nature of the matter is.

It has been suggested that I might order this to be done simply as chairman of the committee. I find there is some dispute among members of this body as to whether a chairman or a member of a committee has that right, and I do not care to be doing anything about which there is the slightest question. Yesterday the Senate ordered the printing of a thousand copies of a like hearing before the Pension Committee from members of the Grand Army of the Republic, who appeared and advocated their views upon general legislation touching the subject-matter of pensions. When that report was made there was no hesitation, there was no objection to it. These men represented a large constituency having votes. These people who appeared before the Committee on Education and Labor also represented a large constituency having votes and advocating a very important cause, and I hope the matter may be printed.

Mr. BECK. My purpose in rising in the first place was to know what it was that we were to vote upon. After the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire I think I understand it perfectly. I think the paper ought to be printed. I think all the information any member of a committee, or a committee itself, desires to have before it for its own use or the use of the Senate, and which is thought by it to be valuable, should be printed. Understanding it now, I shall not vote against the motion. I think I know what it is, and I shall vote for the printing of it with pleasure.

Mr. MORGAN. If the rule is to be established that all the committees of this body have equal rights before the Senate I shall not object to the printing of this paper at the expense of the Government of the United States. It has only been a couple of days, I believe, since a subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations listened to some very able arguments from Mr. Hanscom and Mr. Charles Levi Woodbury and some other gentlemen upon the great and interesting question of the fisheries on the northeastern coast, which would be very instructive indeed to this country, both on matters of law and matters of fact; and they relate to a question which we shall have to decide perhaps sooner or later. We did not feel authorized to come here with the able arguments of these gentlemen, because in doing a matter of that kind we might possibly offend against persons who would think they had equal right to come before a committee of the Senate and present their views in opposition.

If the right of petition, or the right of instruction, or the right of argument is to be exercised by the citizens of the United States through the committees of this body, then let us throw the doors open and let every person come in, pro and con. The whisky dealers, the grog-shop men on the corners, the men who drink spirits, and sometimes, perhaps very often, get drunk, and never get drunk that they do not do wrong, have just as much right to enjoy the public expenditure in having themselves heard before that committee as the lady and clergymen that the Senator from New Hampshire brings to our attention by stating what they have said before this committee.

In dealing with the people of the United States let us deal fairly with all classes, and not, because we happen to be taken up or infatuated with a particular set of ideas, bring those ideas before the Senate of the United States and demand that they shall be printed for the use of Senators. Let us hear the other side if we are going to hear any in this way. Do not let us close our doors against the access of all the people, and the right of any man to go there and have his remarks taken down and printed for the use of the Senate, if we grant the right to any person. It is a species of favoritism that I am not disposed to encourage.

Mr. BECK. The reason why I favor the printing of this paper is this: We have a Committee on Education and Labor; they are presumed to represent all sides of all questions coming before them, and when they hear anything that in their judgment enlightens them or the Senate, and request that it shall be printed, I think the Senate ought to allow it to be done. I know the Finance Committee particularly and the Committee on Appropriations have had valuable investigations. Members of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, boards of trade, and others have appeared before us and made statements, and we have selected such portions of their debate as we thought important for the information of the Senate and have had them printed time and again. I never knew such a request to be refused. It being a matter in the discretion of the committee, and they having exercised that discretion as to the propriety of publishing the matter, I think courtesy to them requires that it should be done. There must be confidence reposed somewhere, and when our committees tell us that matter submitted to them is valuable, for one I shall vote to print it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to print a thousand copies of this paper for the use of the Senate, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call for the yeas and nays will be withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the yeas and nays have been ordered, there must be unanimous consent to withdraw the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to withdrawing the call for the yeas and nays? The Chair hears none. The question is on the adoption of the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS UNDER FRENCH AND SPANISH TREATIES.

Mr. HOAR. I move that a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury received on the 26th of January, made in response to a resolution of the Senate asking for certain information in regard to the French spoliation claims, &c., be withdrawn from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which it was referred, and referred to the Committee on Claims. The reference was made by the Senate by inadvertence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is true. The proper reference should have been to the Committee on Claims, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of a certain communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in respect to French spoliation claims and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

SUSPENSIONS AND REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, in pursuance of a not very excellent precedent, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a few remarks on any bill that may be pending or any resolution that may possibly be brought forward, and conclude my remarks with a motion. I will make a motion in one moment; I beg the Senate to indulge me.

I find on reading the RECORD, and I think no Senator here can be mistaken in it, that when the resolutions were offered yesterday which were tabled this morning, the notice given, and which I and others who are interested had a right to expect would be carried out, was that from the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], who said that on this morning he would move to refer the resolution and the substitute to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I and other Senators had a right to infer that that notice given and appearing here as matter of record would be legitimately and honorably adhered to. This morning when a resolution which I had written and propounded in open session yesterday came up after this recorded notice of what disposition was to be made of it, a Senator on this floor, whose voice is too suppressed to be heard except by himself, made first a speech and then moved an undebatable motion. I do not mind being run over by a railroad train, but I do not like to be mashed up by a wheelbarrow. [Laughter.]

I ask now of this Senate that they will do that which appears on this RECORD of yesterday's proceedings would be done, take up the resolution from the table and then let the Senator from Kansas move, as I know he will do and as I will not object to, a reference of it to any proper committee. I ask now that the Senate shall take the resolution from the table and then let the Senator from Kansas move to refer it to the committee, and I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I move to take it from the table. It is on the table by the motion of the Senator from Vermont. I ask now to take it from the table only with the view that the Senator from Kansas can move to refer it to the committee indicated by himself in the RECORD of yesterday's debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate take from the table the resolution referred to by him, and that it shall now be considered. Is there objection to that proposition? If not, the resolution will be again considered as before the Senate. What is the motion made by the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If it is before the Senate, I ask the Senator from Kansas to carry out his suggestion of yesterday, and if he does not, I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No, sir. The Senator from Kansas said he would make that motion, as appears here in the RECORD. I am not going to make it. I do not make any motion in respect to it except to have it voted on right here.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. GETTY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is now in order under Rule VIII, and the first case on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 225) to authorize Col. George W. Getty, United States Army, retired, to be placed upon the retired-list of the Army with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general, was announced as first in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see the Senator who reported that bill [Mr. SEWELL] or the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] who wishes to debate it. I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over without displacement.

PEARSON C. MONTGOMERY.

The bill (S. 18) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that bill go over without prejudice so that the Senator who reported it [Mr. PIKE] may be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be taken.

DECORATIONS TO CONSUL RAWICZ.

The bill (S. 1053) to permit Joseph Rawicz, United States consul at Warsaw, Russia, to accept certain decorations tendered him by the Russian Government was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion to postpone indefinitely this bill, made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. LIZZIE D. CLARKE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 32) for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie D. Clarke, of New Orleans. It provides for the payment to Mrs. Lizzie D. Clarke, widow in community of Thomas L. Clarke, deceased, late of New Orleans, tutrix of his minor child and administratrix of his estate, $60,000, for the loss of the steamboat Belle, that steamboat being the property of Thomas L. Clarke and lost on the Rio Grande River while under lease by the Government of the United States under contract with the owner.

Mr. PLUMB. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. CONGER. I think that can hardly be considered under the five-minute rule. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, goes over under the rule.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask the Senator from Michigan to withdraw the objection just to hear a statement. There is no difficulty about the case.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. JACKSON. This was under an actual contract by the Government. General Steele, in command of the United States forces in Texas in September, 1865, had occasion to transfer military stores from Brownsville up to Ringgold barracks. He employed this boat under an express contract; he authorized the quartermaster to employ it at a stipulated price per day, and with the distinct agreement that if the boat was lost the Government would pay for it. The boat was not subject to impressment; the boat was in Mexican waters and in Mexican territory. He sent his quartermaster across the river to engage the boat and contracted for it upon those terms; it was turned over to the Government upon those terms; the Government manned the boat; placed its officers in charge of it; loaded it, and the boat was lost on the trip; and, of course, the Government ought to pay for it. The price was ascertained, by agreement of the parties, by an umpire, it being part of the contract that in case of loss it should be referred to an umpire.

A case of more merit could not be presented. There is no difficulty about it, and the committee were unanimous. We have steadily paid such claims.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to make a short statement in regard to this matter? I introduced the bill, and took a great deal of pains to ascertain the nature of it before I did so. It received a unanimous report in the House from the Judiciary Committee, as well as from the Committee on Claims of this body at the last Congress, it having come in at a late day. The present Quartermaster-General of the United States Army, General Holabird, to whom the case was referred and to whom questions were put if there was any possible doubt about it, gave his testimony, in which he used this language:

> Operations without these boats would have been impossible on that river; so it was with the steamer Bell, belonging to Mr. Clarke. I do not wish to argue this case, but it is apparent to me that the owner would not regard the question of fault or no fault in the loss of the steamer. She was in other hands than his own, and she was actually lost, and that fact was conceded; if lost by negligence, act of the enemy, or any other cause, the owner was to be paid for his boat precisely the same. It seems strange that it is legal to recognize the verbal agreement in just so far as the few days here is concerned, and repudiate the rest of the agreement as concerns the loss of the boat.
> The penny is paid and the pound denied. I look upon this case as one of purely good faith under the pressure of war, and therefore as overriding all ordinary precedents and rules.
> In my judgment Major Potter and his commander had full and sufficient authority to do what they did do; that is, to do all that was needful and necessary to carry out their instructions as to the military operations depending upon themselves in any practicable or possible way, by hiring anything out of their reach that could not be impressed, and by impressing any means of conveyance at hand. This was true whether the matter of agreement was reduced to writing or (time not admitting) having it in verbal form so that it was fully and fairly understood by the parties thereto. Now, it was so far well understood that the property was transferred from the owner and moved from the Mexican side of the river to the Texas side, and placed in the hands of our officers. Clarke executed his part of the agreement, and the Government, in my judgment, should do its part. There were no telegraph lines in 1865, and no other swift means of communication between the Government and its forces on the Rio Grande. All the intermediate country between Washington city and the Rio Grande was boiling with war and covered with resulting confusion; the officers responsible for conducting operations on that remote frontier had to stand alone and act as best they might in order to secure success and avoid failure. The responsibilities of such a period can be but imperfectly passed upon in the light of the happy peace that rests upon this great capital to day.
> In conclusion, to my mind the reduction of this agreement to writing would not have changed materially its binding force. It was absolutely impracticable in the nature of things to conform to the statute of 1862.

And the Quartermaster-General further said—I do not care to read it all—that he had acted as quartermaster in that country at that time and made the same kind of contract, and the boat had been paid for out of the Treasury of the United States under exactly similar circumstances. So we have the assurance of the Quartermaster-General of the United States, after full investigation, that he himself had made just such contracts and the Government had sanctioned and paid for them, and there was absolute good faith in this contract. All that was done was looked into carefully before the committees of both Houses, and I think the Senator from Michigan, when he comes to look at it, will at least give us a chance to have the Senate pass upon it.

Mr. CONGER. The statement made would go to show that the Government entered into a contract, and that this claim is merely the result of a failure of contract, or from the Government not having complied with its contract. If that were the case, there is no need of coming to Congress at all with any such bill as this; the Departments could carry out that contract as they have done in a thousand other cases.

Although this seems to be a familiar case, I do not remember it so as to state positively about it, but my recollection is that this was a vessel that had been used, and was being used, when the confederacy had power over our side of this river, and that it had gone across the river for safe-keeping into Mexico, that it was liable if on our side of the river to seizure and to all the uses that could be made of property of the enemy taken by us. I do not know what reason the Quartermaster-General may have had for recommending this payment, but one little reason would be very apparent, that he himself had made contracts of the same kind and that they had been approved.

I have no particular recollection about this case, but it is twenty-two or twenty-three years since this boat was taken, and the claim has been before almost every committee of the other House from that time to this, as I remember.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to say to the Senator that it was presented for the first time during the Christmas holidays year before last, and never was before Congress except during about sixty days from that time to the 4th of March last, and the Senator knows how busy both Houses were then and during that time. A unanimous report was made, as I understand, by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House and the Committee on Claims of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I was going to add one other word which the Senator may reply to. Why does not the bill provide that this case shall go before the Court of Claims?

Mr. BECK. Because the facts were so plain in this case that we thought Congress itself could settle it upon the proofs that were submitted. There is one remark I failed to make originally. There was no enemy in this case, no confederate matter mixed up with it. The Quartermaster-General says:

> As to precedents. In 1863, on the arrival of the expedition to the Rio Grande at Fort Brown, three steamers were found, under the Mexican flag, tied up at Matamoras, on the Mexican side of the river. In precisely similar circumstances they were obtained by the present writer, under the orders of the military commander present, on a verbal promise of the payment for their full value. They were delivered over for immediate service, manned, and wooded, and the money for their purchase was duly paid subsequently in New Orleans, and the accounts were passed at the Treasury.

It shows a clear case, beyond all doubt.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to obstruct the passage of this bill if it is unanimously reported from the committee; but there are so many of these old cases where boats were lost and so many classes of claims that have heretofore been pending, and I presume are now, as claims against the Government for property taken while war was raging, captured property, for the loss or use of which no government ever has been or ever would be responsible under the law of nations or the laws of war, that I watch them as they arise. Having had several years' experience in the investigation of them in the Committee on War Claims of the House, I watch them as they come up, and if they have a familiar look to me as cases that ought not to be allowed, I object. I desire to know if the committee are satisfied with this case. If they are, I do not wish to interpose an objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAILY RECESS.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask consent to offer the following order at this time:

Ordered, That the Senate will take a recess on each day at 2 o'clock and be in session again at 2.30 p. m. This order may be suspended by a vote of a quorum required in case of adjournment, to be had without debate.

If the Senate will indulge me just a moment, I wish to say that that is what takes place in the Senate Chamber practically every day and to the very great embarrassment of many gentlemen, particularly gentlemen who have the floor from the evening before, as the Senator from Illinois has the floor to-day, upon some great leading measure of public policy. Of course Senators who have been working from 10 o'clock on their committees down to 2 o'clock have had four hours of consecutive labor, and they must necessarily withdraw from the Senate, and those who remain do so at the expense, doubtless, to some of them of health and to all of them of comfort. So if we can have a general agreement that each day we shall take a recess of thirty minutes, commencing at 2 o'clock, on the completion of the morning hour, we should greatly accommodate members of the Senate and the Senate would become refreshed and ready to go on with business. We do it practically anyhow, and I think it ought to have the sanction of law.

I, for one, have been very frequently tempted to have a call of the Senate in order that a gentleman might not be abandoned on the floor who was arguing some very great question.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask my friend from Alabama if he has considered the fact that within the space of half an hour it would be impossible for the restaurant to accommodate the whole Senate at lunch.

Mr. MORGAN. That has been suggested to me, and the answer to it I think is a very obvious one, that the keeper of the restaurant and those who provide lunches for Senators here would understand that the period named was an interval for which they would be expected to provide, and they would have no difficulty, perhaps, in providing for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind Senators that the matter is not debatable except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORGAN. I supposed there was unanimous consent; otherwise I would not have intruded on the Senate with the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent to consider this motion or resolution at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL. I think it had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I think it had better go to the Committee on Rules. It is a very interesting subject, and they may have other suggestions to make.

Mr. MORGAN. Let it go to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the proposed order be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be printed.

J. A. HENRY AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 289) for the relief of J. A. Henry and others was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to J. A. Henry of $52; to Robert Stevenson of $54; to L. T. Green of $51; to Masonic Hall Company, Atlanta, Ga., of $475; to E. Rouff of $45; to E. C. Clements of $200; to R. W. Corbin of $22.50; to Mrs. M. J. Donahoe of $345.50; to N. C. Blonton of $430, to Mrs. J. P. Williams of $900; to Miles S. Draughn of $60, in full of all claims or demands arising under their respective contracts against the United States.

Mr. JACKSON. The money is due under express contract and regular vouchers were given. The committee have always reported favorably in such cases.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish the Senator from Tennessee would tell us why these claims are not paid without the intervention of Congress, if they are plainly a matter of contract and necessary for the conduct of the Army?

Mr. JACKSON. Because the act of 1867 suspended their payment.

Mr. ALLISON. Why?

Mr. JACKSON. It cut off the Department from paying these matters. They all have to come to Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator turn to the section of the statute to which he refers?

Mr. JACKSON. The act of February 21, 1867, volume 14 of the Statutes at Large, page 397, provides that the act of July 4, 1864—

Shall not be construed to authorize the settlement of any claim for supplies or stores taken or furnished for the use of, or used by, the armies of the United States, nor for the occupation of, or injury to, real estate, nor for the consumption, appropriation, or destruction of, or damage to, personal property, by the military authorities or troops of the United States, where such claim originated during the war for the suppression of the Southern rebellion, in a State, or part of a State, declared in insurrection by the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated July 1, 1862.

These claims are for rent of buildings rented by quartermasters under express contract and where regular vouchers were given.

Mr. ALLISON. But I do not understand that statute to interfere with matters of contract where property was appropriated in the States then supposed to be in rebellion.

Mr. COCKRELL. It embraces all.

Mr. JACKSON. That is the construction placed upon it. When these claims are referred to the Department they place that construction upon it and refuse to pay, and hence the parties have to come to Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. Why are not these claims included in those adjudicated by the commission and reported to us, generally known as the 4th of July claims?

Mr. JACKSON. It does not appear why they are not sent there, but if presented they would be cut off by this act.

Mr. INGALLS. It seems very mysterious that these claims should be lingering along here for twenty years if they are matters of express contract whose validity was never questioned and whose force was never denied. When the tribunals of this country have been open for that period, that we should be called upon day by day to pass bills for sums ranging from $60,000 down to $50, as we have done this morning, I confess it is an extraordinary condition of affairs.

Mr. JACKSON. These claims have been here for the last five or six or ten years, and have been uniformly reported, passing this House and failing in the other, or passing in the other and failing here. I have before me many of this class of claims not yet reported. They have been uniformly reported favorably, and have failed because of nonaction in one or the other House of Congress.

Mr. HOAR. At the risk of detaining the Senate a moment I should like to state this matter once more.

When our arms subdued portions of the rebel territory it was within the election of the Government, according to the law of nations, to treat all the personal property which came into our possession as booty and to treat all the real estate that we occupied as captured and subjugated. It was within its election also to say to those people that if they submitted their private property would be respected, and if they were compelled to give their personal property to the use of the United States Government they should be paid for it, and if their real property was occupied for Government business—hospitals or headquarters or otherwise—a reasonable rent should be paid. We elected the latter in dealing with our countrymen with whom we had been at war, as our Government had a right to do under the laws of nations and the laws of the United States, as the Supreme Court has frequently held.

When personal property was taken for this purpose, for the use of the Army, like wheat or grain or wood for fuel, vouchers were given. When real property was taken by the commanding officer on the spot, designed to be used and appropriated under his right of capture, he did it; and that was sometimes done, very often where it was for purposes of fortification or present defense; but where for Government offices, like headquarters, military posts, and so on, the custom was to manifest the election not to take it under the harsh rule of war, but to take it for the purpose of being paid for by having a board of officers ascertain a proper rental, and a voucher was given by the quartermaster.

When those things were done the Treasury Department proceeded as fast as it could after the war to make payment for the rent of the property or allow compensation for the personal property taken and used; but Congress in 1867 concluded not to leave that discretion to the Departments any longer and passed the act which has been cited by my honorable friend from Tennessee. Shortly after that time a tribunal was established known as the Southern Claims Commission, which was authorized to audit and report to Congress all the cases of taking of personal property, and that has been done; and in some of the other cases, in cases not coming within the Southern Claims Commission, which is the case of loyal citizens, the War Department makes a regular report to Congress every year; and an omnibus bill comes to us annually.

In the case of the rental of real estate the individual claimants have been left to come to Congress and make their own case, and the Committee on Claims has always required in order to grant relief that there should be either an award fixing the amount of rent by a board of army officers or a voucher and certificate by the quartermaster that the property was taken to be paid for and the rent to be paid for it; and there has not been an instance, I suppose, where either House of Congress has ever denied a claim so established.

The Court of Claims never has been open to either of these classes. They have been expressly prohibited from a resort to the Court of Claims; and the course of business in Congress is such, as every Senator knows, that cases of this kind, presented, proved, and reported favorably by committees six, eight, ten, or twelve years ago, go from Congress to Congress without getting through both branches.

If I may have one more minute by consent to finish, as my five minutes are up, I will say that the Committee on Claims makes its report, and when it is reached on this Calendar under the Anthony rule some Senator objects. The Senator objecting frequently does not know anything about the merits of the case, but he sees that it is a Southern claim; he sees that the person making it was perhaps a disloyal person, and he thinks that it had better be inquired into further, and he objects. It then goes on to the General Calendar, and unless it is a case of importance and interest enough to compel the Senate on the motion of an individual Senator to take it up and displace or jostle aside some of the important questions of general public legislation, it never will be reached.

Now, I will venture to say there will be from fifty to one hundred and fifty or two hundred cases which will be examined by the Committee on Claims in this branch or the other at this Congress which will come in here, which, if debated and stated to the Senate, would not create a single negative vote here, that will go over to the next Congress and the next Congress and the next Congress still. That is the difficulty of dealing with the great concerns of a nation of fifty or sixty millions of people—that the individual claim gets jostled aside; and that has been the fortune of these particular claims that the Senator from Tennessee has spoken to. That is the whole story.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to supplement the very accurate statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts with this fact: Nearly all these claims are of that class which arose between the cessation of actual hostilities in the field and the time when the Supreme Court decided that the war was actually over; that was in August, 1866. The claims between the cessation of actual hostilities in the field and that time all have to come to Congress. After that time as a matter of course, they are paid just as they would be paid if arising in any other State.

Mr. HOAR. I ought to have added that in nearly all these cases the claim arose after a pledge of the national faith, as in the case, for instance, of the State of Louisiana. General Banks and General Butler, his predecessor, made a pledge of the national faith to that people that, if they submitted, their private property would be respected; and no soldier, of course, ever wittingly violated or desired to violate that pledge. The Supreme Court of the United States has held in several cases that that pledge given by General Banks was binding upon the nation; but where General Banks issued some subsequent orders which he thought consistent with it, but the Supreme Court thought inconsistent, the Supreme Court held that those orders were not within the power of the military commander even in a theater of actual war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EVIDENCE IN CERTAIN STATE CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 71) for the benefit of the States of Texas, Colorado, Oregon, Nebraska, California, Kansas, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, and Nevada when a Territory, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that whenever the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War, in adjusting the claims of the States of Texas, Colorado, Oregon, Nebraska, California, Kansas, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, and Nevada when a Territory, arising under acts of Congress approved July 27, 1861, and June 27, 1882, shall find that any original paper shall have been lost, destroyed, or missing, upon proof thereof copies of all documents and papers relating thereto may be certified by the proper State officers having custody of such papers, under their seals of office; and such evidence, and all other competent secondary evidence, when filed with the Secretary of the Treasury or Secretary of War, shall be received by them in lieu of the lost original papers, and used in evidence in the adjustment of the claims in all respects as the originals.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAMUEL B. SEAT.

The bill (S. 24) for the relief of Samuel B. Seat, administrator of Christian Kropp, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Samuel B. Seat, of Montgomery County, Tennessee, $933.72, to refund the amount hitherto paid by him in excess of what was actually due by him to the United States, and which he paid in satisfaction of an erroneous judgment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. CROOK.

The bill (S. 100) for the relief of William H. Crook was announced as next in order.

Mr. JACKSON. That bill is reported by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] who is absent, and I suggest that it go over until to-morrow without losing its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. CONGER. I hope it will not lose its place on the Calendar. That bill was passed by the Senate once before and has been reported upon favorably.

Mr. JACKSON. I have no objection to its being taken up, but I supposed the presence of the Senator from Delaware would be needed. If the Senate is willing to take it up, I have no objection.

Mr. CONGER. I have no desire to have it taken up to-day, but I do not desire that it shall lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. JACKSON. The request I made was that it should not lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

ARMS, ETC., FOR THE MILITIA.

The bill (S. 222) to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DOLPH. I regret that I had not notice that a bill of this character was upon the Calendar so that I might have examined what was proposed by the bill. I do not wish to object to its consideration under the eighth rule and throw it over indefinitely, but I ask the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], who reported it, to let it go over until to-morrow by common consent and take its place on the Calendar.

I think the provision that arms to the militia shall be distributed among the States only in proportion to their representation in Congress is a very unjust one. If that is a change of the existing law I do not think it ought to be made. The State of New York, for instance, should not have thirty-four times the amount of arms and munitions allotted to the State of Oregon, with its large extent of territory and surrounded still by Indians and with tribes of Indians within its borders and subject to Indian outbreaks and other occasions for the use of the State militia. I simply desire to examine the bill. Perhaps I shall have no objection to it to-morrow after I have gone over it.

Mr. SEWELL. This bill is practically the same as a bill passed by the Senate last year. It does not change the mode of distribution in the respect referred to by the Senator from Oregon; that is, according to the numbers of Congressmen and Senators; but it provides for a minimum number of uniformed men of the National Guard in each of the States and Territories, which is not provided by the present law. There are some amendments reported by the committee which change the character of the bill somewhat. Will the Senator hear them?

Mr. DOLPH. I have no objection to letting the amendments be acted on, but I should like to ask that the bill go over or reserve my right to have it go over.

Mr. SEWELL. I would rather go on with the amendments and perfect the bill; and then if the Senator from Oregon wishes to have it go over until to-morrow, I shall not object.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to state that I am in receipt of a communication from the governor of my state, calling attention to the fact that during the war with Joseph's band of Indians some years ago we were compelled to borrow from Washington Territory arms and ammunition for our State militia; that we are now unprepared to repay the Territory, and have had to call on the Secretary of War to send, out of our quota to which we are entitled, the necessary amount of arms to repay the Territory of Washington.

We have not sufficient arms and munitions of war to equip our State militia, and, as I say, I think we are differently situated in Oregon from what some of the other States are. I desire time to examine the bill, and see if it makes any change in the existing law, or if I can not propose some that would be equitable and just.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator objecting, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. SEWELL. I do not understand the Senator to object. I wish to perfect the bill by the amendments of the committee, and then let the bill lie over.

Mr. DOLPH. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in line 9, section 1, after the word "providing," to strike out "arms, equipments, ammunition, ordnance stores, and tents for the militia" and insert "ordnance and ordnance stores, quartermaster's stores, and camp equipage for issue to the militia;" so as to read:

SECTION 1. That the sum of $600,000 is hereby annually appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of providing ordnance and ordnance stores, quartermaster's stores, and camp equipage for issue to the militia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 14, section 2, after the word "Territories," to strike out "on the books of the Ordnance Department by the Chief of Ordnance of the Army;" in line 17, after the word "Representatives," to strike out "or Delegates;" in line 18, after the word "State," to strike out "and Territory;" in line 19, after the words "United States," to insert "and to the Territories and District of Columbia such proportion and under such regulations as the President may prescribe;" in line 21, after the word "That," to strike out "each" and insert "no;" in line 22, after the word "State," to strike out "and Territory," and in the same line, after the word "shall," to strike out "only;" in line 23, before the word "of," to strike out "of so much," and in the same line, after the word "it," to strike out "as the proportion of" and insert "unless;" and in line 25, after the word "militia," to strike out the words "as determined by the report of the Secretary of War made on the preceding first Monday in February, bears to the maximum number of active militia for which such State or Territory is entitled to the benefits of this act" and insert "shall be at least one hundred men for each Senator and Representative to which such State is entitled in the Congress of the United States;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That said appropriation shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories, under the direction of the Secretary of War, according to the number of Senators and Representatives to which each State respectively is entitled in the Congress of the United States, and to the Territories and District of Columbia such proportion and under such regulations as the President may prescribe: Provided, however, That no State shall be entitled to the benefits of the appropriation apportioned to it unless the number of its regularly enlisted, organized, and uniformed active militia shall be at least one hundred men for each Senator and Representative to which such State is entitled in the Congress of the United States. And the amount of said appropriation which is thus determined not to be available shall be covered back into the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That in time of peace the number of active militia for which each State and Territory shall be entitled to receive its apportionment of the appropriations made by this act shall not exceed five hundred regularly uniformed commissioned officers and enlisted men for each Representative or Delegate to which such State or Territory is entitled in the Congress of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 41, section 4, after the word "ordnance," to insert "and," and in the same line, after the word "stores," to strike out "and tents" and insert "quartermaster's stores and camp equipage;" in line 44, after the word "made," to strike out "by the Chief of Ordnance of the Army;" in line 47, after the word "for," to strike out "to the Chief of Ordnance of the Army;" and in line 49, after the word "purpose," to strike out "the Chief of Ordnance of the Army, under the direction of;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 43. That the purchase or manufacture of ordnance and ordnance stores, quartermaster's stores, and camp equipage for the militia under the provisions of this act shall be made by the direction of the Secretary of War, and they shall be receipted for and shall remain the property of the United States, and be annually accounted for by the governors of the States and Territories, for which purpose the Secretary of War shall prescribe and supply the necessary blanks and make such regulations as he may deem necessary to protect the interest of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, after the word "the," in line 57, to strike out "Chief of Ordnance of the Army, for the action of the;" and in line 59, after the word "and," to insert "if sold;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That all arms, equipments, ordnance stores, or tents which may become unserviceable or unsuitable shall be examined by a board of officers of the militia, and its reports shall be forwarded by the governor of the State or Territory direct to the Secretary of War, who shall direct what disposition, by sale or otherwise, shall be made of them; and, if sold, the proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That for all the purposes of this act the District of Columbia shall be accounted and treated as a Territory entitled to one Delegate in Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL. I move, on the tenth line of the first section, to amend by striking out the word "ordnance," where it first occurs, and inserting "arms," the word "ordnance" technically meaning heavy guns. It will then read:

Arms and ordnance stores, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL. I move to amend further in section 4, line 41, where the word "ordnance" occurs, by striking it out and inserting "arms."

Mr. CONGER. I ask whether that would prevent furnishing artillery to States?

Mr. SEWELL. It would not. You might bring in small guns under the head of "arms," but you could not bring in small-arms under the head of "ordnance."

Mr. CONGER. Why not leave both in?

Mr. SEWELL. It has been the custom heretofore to issue light batteries under the head of "arms." Now, if the Senator from Oregon desires to have the bill go over I shall not object.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to have the bill go over and retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to make a suggestion of amendment in line 45, section 4. It is stated here that the purchase or manufacture of these stores to be supplied to the militia is to be under the direction of the Secretary of War. I think this provision is broad enough to authorize him to have an establishment especially for this purpose. I would propose, therefore, to amend by inserting in line 45, after the word "War," the words:

As such arms and ordnance stores and quartermasters' stores are now provided for the use of the regular Army.

So that the Secretary of War shall use the same machinery for the purpose of manufacture or for the purpose of purchasing by contract or otherwise for the use of the militia that he does for the use of the regular Army.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to that. There is no necessity for it really, because we have a great deal more arms manufactured at our own arsenals than will supply the militia.

Mr. PLUMB. I presume that to be true, and therefore I propose to limit it in this way, because otherwise I think the Secretary might set up a separate establishment.

Mr. SEWELL. There is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I therefore move to insert after the word "War," in line 45, the words:

As such arms, ordnance, quartermasters' stores, and camp equipage are now manufactured or otherwise provided for the use of the regular Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] asks that the bill lie over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest that this bill be printed as amended, so that when it comes up to-morrow we can see exactly what shape it is in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 91) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use certain unexpended balances for the relief of the Northern Cheyennes in Montana.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], proposing to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert a substitute.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, it is not very encouraging that in the discussion of so important a question as the one under consideration, in which the admission of a State into the Union is involved, so little interest should be taken as seems to have been in this instance. Feeling as I do, however, that these people having gone from States where they were entitled to all the rights of citizens under the Constitution, and as residents of this Territory desiring to be clothed again with all the rights and privileges of American citizens by admission as a State into this Union, I deem it at least a duty that I owe to those whom I represent to give such encouragement as I may be able to do to these people who are now asking the favor of the Congress of the United States. In doing so I desire to discuss this question on as high a plane of statesmanship as I am capable.

I do not agree with the propositions laid down by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in reference to the line that necessarily must be followed (as they say) in order to give a State the right of admission into this Union. The Constitution of the United States declares that "new States may be admitted by the Congress of the United States;" not Territories in order that they may become States, but "new States." In other words, I suppose Territories where the people have lawfully taken upon themselves the conditions of an inchoate State were to be recognized by act of Congress, that the full and complete sovereignty of Statehood should be conferred upon them by admitting them as "new States."

There are certain conditions that must be present in order that this admission should follow. Conditions present have always been required by Congress on the admission of a new State into the Union. These conditions have varied, however, according to the circumstances surrounding the people at the time of asking favorable action by Congress. Two lines of precedents have been followed by the Congress of the United States until either may be accepted in the judgment of Congress without disobedience to the Constitution or the violation of any fixed law. One line of precedents which may be properly followed is by an enabling act of Congress complied with by the people prior to the formation of a State in order to be admitted. The other line is that when there is the presence of certain conditions as to area, population, wealth, productive capacity, and such influences of soil and climate as to insure a growth instead of a decrease in population; and the people having clothed themselves with the paraphernalia necessary to Statehood they have been admitted, and in such case, in my judgment, it is the duty of Congress to admit them into the Union.

These conditions in connection with Dakota are admitted. If admitted, why shall not Dakota be accepted and allowed to become a State? But upon the proper application of these people to be admitted into the Union on a perfect equality with the other States we find objection is made thereto; whether well founded or not is for the Congress of the United States to determine.

I am sorry that the two Senators, one from Missouri, and the other from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] a Senator standing in the place of one of the great men of the nation who represented South Carolina many years, differing in his views with a large majority of the people of this country, but in that difference always showing an ability that was at least to be recognized by all who knew and heard him; and so, too, with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], representing a State that for so many years was represented by another of the great men of this nation, Thomas H. Benton, who was heard so often in these Halls so ably and so eloquently on the great questions which arose while he represented that people; these two gentlemen appear to be in the lead to-day in opposition to the rights, as I believe, of the people of this great Territory—I am sorry that they are now absent.
